Mr. CRUMPACKER. I believe in putting in the constitution all that may be regarded as necessary fundamental law. I have little fear of the judges. I live in a State where they have honest, upright judges, and I have high regard for the Federal courts.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For a question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman says that in Indiana the judges are clean and upright, and I suppose they are. I would like to ask the gentleman if he favors the judges writing the laws of the country?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not in favor of the judges writing the law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is what they have been doing.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the gentleman has more politics than law in his head. I do not agree with that proposition at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not plead guilty to being a lawyer. The gentleman has made a charge which he can not substantiate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I wish to submit some observations upon the great questions pending, and I do not wish to be sidetracked in a discussion of the judiciary.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest that while I think the gentleman is entirely right in not yielding, I think that in passing he ought to apologize to the gentleman from Illinois, who interrupted him, who says he has been charged with being a lawyer and seems to take offense at it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I did not mean anything offensive to the gentleman. I will withdraw the imputation that he is a lawyer.

Were the framers of the Arizona constitution afraid of the people? They evidently were, because they took advantage of an opportunity to nail provisions into the constitution which they could with entire propriety have left to the consideration of the voters of the new State. But they were not willing to do it. They were afraid of the people. They were afraid to leave those questions to be dealt with by the legislative branch of the government.

I think the New Mexican constitution in the main is a fairly good charter of government. I believe it can be amended with sufficient facility. It may be amended with greater facility than the constitutions of more than half of the States in the Federal Union now. The State I live in may be a little old-fashioned in some respects. We believe in old-fashioned virtues adapted to new-fashioned standards of life. The Indiana constitution provides that a proposed amendment must be agreed to by two-thirds of the entire membership of two successive legislatures before it can be submitted to the people for ratification. It has been amended but few times. It was adopted in 1851, and it is a real constitution, because it defines and outlines the State government and is not full of legislative detail.

THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION PROGRESSIVE.

The Constitution of the United States has been criticized in the course of this debate as undemocratic and nonprogressive. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], in a speech he made two or three days ago in this Chamber, declared that its shackles were festering upon the wrists and ankles of the people at this time and seriously obstructing progress. Mr. Chairman, I have great reverence for the Federal Constitution. Among its chief virtues is its capacity for growth, its adaptability to changed and changing conditions.

If it were not for its progressive spirit it would have gone to the scrap heap of disuse generations ago. It abounds in eternal principles safeguarding the fundamental rights of the citizen rather than legislative details incapable of adjusting themselves to new conditions. It is as well adapted to the needs of this time as it was to the needs of the time that gave it birth. Its principles are as eternal as the laws of a Newton or a Kepler. I suppose if the law of gravitation had been embodied in the Constitution there would be statesmen and reformers to-day declaring that law nonprogressive and undemocratic and insisting that the people should have the right to repeal or amend it by initiative and referendum. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Talk about the Federal Constitution being despotic and nonprogressive. There never was an instrument or charter of government in the history of civilization that so admirably embodied in its provisions principles so well adapted for growth and development—principles that are so capable of meeting the wants of all conditions and stages of political, social, and economic development as does the Constitution of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I know that there are those who want to tinker it, who are seeking to destroy its representative character. I know to-day that there are many who would take from the courts the power to determine whether legislation is in conflict with the Constitution. That proposition might carry at a popular election, but I do not believe it would. If that power were taken from the courts, the Constitution would be worthless and the end would be anarchy.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be willing to give the people an opportunity to approve this—whether they would be willing to give the judges the power of usurping the functions of legislative bodies?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I feel justified in declining to answer such a question. The fear of courts usurping legislative power exists only in the fancy of the gentleman. I will discuss the courts somewhat when I come to the proposition for the recall of judges.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. You say that if the power to decide as to the constitutionality of a law is taken away from the judges anarchy would be the result. With what class of people would the anarchy be most likely to originate, and what class of people would be most likely to advocate it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The demagogues, the dreamers, the doctrinaires who are now denouncing the Constitution because it stands for stability, for security of life, liberty, and property.

Mr. FOWLER. One more question, if you please.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you not think that the good sense of the people of the United States will always rise above the demagogue and the designing newspaper man?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The common people of the United States have more good hard sense and more honesty than is possessed by many self-appointed political leaders. They know their own limitations. They know that the ordinary business man, the ordinary man of affairs, has not the time nor the opportunity to investigate complicated problems of government.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that if the Constitution was absolutely destroyed the good judgment of the American people would at once reenact one for the purpose of establishing a stable form of government?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. From your standpoint what is the use of having a constitution if the people are infallible? What is the use of having limitations on government if the people are incapable of making mistakes? Absolutely none. You discredit the people and their capacity for self-government when you want a constitution. The people would discredit themselves and their ability to make wise laws, from your standpoint, if they should create another constitution, because a constitution is a limitation on the power of the government and the power of the people. I believe in a constitution myself, with authority in the courts to prevent its violation by the lawmaking branch of the Government. No legislative body should enact a law in conflict with the constitution nor should the people under the referendum be allowed to do so.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman does not answer my question.

THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION.

Mr. JACKSON. I desire to suggest to the gentleman, along the line he was discussing when the gentleman on the other side of the aisle asked him a question, whether he has overlooked the proposition that the United States Government is about the only Government on earth, and was the only one, I believe, until within the last few years, in which the judges have the power to declare a law unconstitutional. I want to say to the gentleman that I agree entirely with him as to the proposition that that is a good thing, but he is hardly warranted in assuming that anarchy would result from the abolition of this power, because the judges of England do not have it, and I believe he will agree that England has at least a stable government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Here is one difference between this country and England. England has an unwritten constitution. She has the constitutional safeguards of liberty and justice, and they are supported by an active, a vigilant, a discriminating public opinion, which is instinctive in the subjects of the British Crown. It is the outgrowth of centuries of struggle for free institutions.

The people of the United States have a written constitution. Ever since this Government was ordained they have depended upon the courts to take care of the rights of the people by enforcing the constitutional safeguards. Public opinion in this country has been dormant upon constitutional guaranties. Probably in the course of the years and the generations public opinion would develop sufficient force and strength to make a written constitution unnecessary, but it would require upheavals that would shake the foundation of our institutions to develop it. Our people would doubtless be educated up to that point, but the cost of the education, I fear, would be terrific. Besides, England is small in area and her people are more homogeneous than ours. This country is vast in area and has, perhaps, the most cosmopolitan population of any country on the globe. There is a great diversity of ideals, social and political, in this country, and the material interests of various sections are often antagonistic in their legislative wants and needs. Without a written constitution there would be interminable conflict among interests and sections, and the result would be disintegration and chaos.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask if it is not a fact that the condition in England has been due to the fact that there has been a liberty of public opinion there—that public opinion has been unhampered? Is it not a fact that that power was taken away from the judges owing to the hostility of the people?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The power to hold acts of Parliament unconstitutional never resided in the courts of England. There never was a time in English history when the highest court in the realm could hold an act of Parliament to be unconstitutional. If courts in this country could not set aside legislative acts when in conflict with the Constitution, legislatures would be omnipotent. They might pass bills of attainder, laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and ex-post facto laws at liberty, with no restraining influence except public opinion. The taxing power could be used to build up one industry at the expense of another with perfect safety if the beneficiaries of the legislation possessed a controlling influence at elections.

Sovereignty in England resides nominally in the Crown, but really it is the House of Commons, the members of which are elected by the people. Tradition and sentiment are more potent factors in English affairs than they are in this country, and conflict of local interests is very much less.

INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

One of the provisions contained in the Arizona constitution that I do not agree with is that establishing the initiative and referendum. The institution of the initiative and referendum has a legitimate place in local government. There is not a State in the Union that does not have it in one aspect or another. It is a valuable and useful institution for the determination of many questions of a business nature in county and city government. For instance, when it is desired to construct a gravel road in a township in Indiana at the expense of the township a certain number of voters of the township may initiate the movement and have an election by the voters in the township to determine whether the improvement shall be made. The voters and taxpayers of the township know whether they desire the improvement and whether their financial condition is such that they can afford it. That is an illustration of a class of questions that may properly and justly be left to the various localities for the people to decide for themselves.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield for another citation on that line?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In the State of Kansas, and I think in most of the States, we have an initiative and referendum for the location or relocation of county seats.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have that also in Indiana, and I think it exists in most of the States. The issuing of bonds for local public improvements, the granting of subsidies to railroad companies, the purchase of water and lighting plants by cities, and the granting of franchises to public utility companies—all of those questions are within the legitimate field of the initiative and referendum.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say at the start that he was opposed generally to the provision of the initiative and referendum?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Although he conceded it obtained in most of the States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I say I am opposed to it as it is provided in this constitution.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will draw the line at which he would have it apply and where he would not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am doing that now.

It is peculiarly adapted for the determination of simple local business questions, for the people of each locality know better than any legislature can know what their respective communities need and desire. There are some general propositions that may be submitted to the people with propriety—the issue of State bonds for the construction of canals or public buildings, for instance. Then there is the question of the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. That question has been submitted to the people of some States, not altogether because they are more competent to decide it than the legislature is, but because it is an easy way for an ambitious statesman to escape the embarrassment of voting upon the question himself. There is no roll call and record of yeas and nays connected with the ballot, and that is probably one reason why the referendum is so popular on the prohibition question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is there a constitutional inhibition upon the legislature to submit by referendum any proposition involving the enactment of a general law within a State?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In what constitution?

Mr. CAMPBELL. In any of the constitutions of any of the States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Almost every constitution declares that all laws shall be enacted by the legislature, and where legislative bodies have voluntarily submitted questions of general application to the people to vote upon, the courts have held the submission invalid. When the constitution reposes the duty of making laws upon the legislature, that duty can not be delegated to anyone else, not even to the voters of the State.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think a large majority of the decisions of the courts in States, and where the question has come to the Supreme Court of the United States, of that court, are that the legislature has authority to submit by referendum to the people of the State questions enacting general law. The authority has been denied, I think, in a few States, and the authority conceded in many instances.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have read recently several decisions of courts on the question of the referendum, and the holding was uniform that where the constitution provides that all laws shall be made by the legislature, the legislature has no power to submit measures to voters to decide by ballot or in any other manner. The courts hold generally in this country that when the constitution reposes a power in a legislative body, that power can not be delegated to any other tribunal, person, or body of persons. That limitation, however, applies only to general legislation and not to matters pertaining to local government of counties, cities, and towns.

In Indiana the prohibition question can not be submitted to the people of the State for decision until the constitution is amended. In the States where the initiative and referendum is in use it is specially authorized by the constitution. The New Mexican constitution now before us for consideration specially authorizes the legislature to establish the initiative and referendum. The framers of that instrument evidently thought the legislature could not refer legislative questions to the people for decision unless the constitution expressly authorized it to do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman will permit me, the State of Virginia has the right to submit by referendum and also the State of Vermont, not on purely sumptuary questions, but on questions of general legislation, and I have some opinions of the courts here, which, of course, I do not care to call particular attention to at this time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not prepared to discuss the decisions under the Virginia constitution nor under the Vermont constitution, because I have not had an opportunity to study the constitutional provisions upon which they were rendered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. May I ask the gentleman if they have not a county option law in the State of Indiana?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They had a county option law until last winter, when it was repealed. County option is purely a local question, and it may be authorized by a legislature which could not provide for a plebiscite in the entire State on the prohibition question.

LIMITATIONS UPON INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

Now, if I am permitted to proceed with my remarks, I desire to locate the line of demarcation between questions that may with safety and propriety be the subjects of initiative and referendum and those that may not.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to say, in regard to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], even granting that what the gentleman from Kansas says is true, that would not answer the purpose of those of us who believe in the initiative and referendum at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I can only repeat, without going into detail, that in my judgment the initiative and referendum is entirely proper and useful respecting local questions of a business nature, but it is not adapted to matters of general legislation. General lawmaking by the voters at the polls is subversive of representative institutions, and can not, under existing conditions, result in wise laws and policies. I make that assertion in the belief that I have in my heart as much respect for the intelligence and sturdy character of the American people as any man in this House. I am one of the people myself. I do not believe the voters have the time nor the opportunity nor the disposition to give such study to the science of government as is necessary to enable them to understand and vote intelligently upon complicated economic, social, and political legislation. They are too busy with their individual interests to inform themselves respecting grave and important matters of legislation. I know how strong the temptation is for politicians to appeal to the vanity of the people and say to them, "You ought to have a larger share in your own Government; this is your Government; you ought to make its laws; you ought to run it." It is a popular appeal ordinarily, but level-headed men in this country know their own limitations. The men on the farm, the men in the shops, the men in the offices are so fully engrossed in their own personal affairs that they do not have the time nor the opportunity to make the thoughtful investigation of general legislative questions that is necessary to vote wisely. Who are competent to make laws? Those only who have the time and the opportunity to study social conditions, to know what the laws are, and what abuses may exist that ought to be corrected; those who are able to put a practical interpretation upon proposed measures and know how they will operate, how they will affect business and social institutions. "Every man his own statesman" is a good political slogan, but you might as well say that every man should be his own lawyer or his own doctor. It is claimed that this modern movement toward a larger popular control of legislation is the logical development of democratic institutions. That position will not stand the test of analysis. The institution of initiative and referendum is ebullitional rather than evolutional.

Every man his own statesman. Government is a science. Some of us, Mr. Chairman, who have been selected by our constituents to represent them in the lawmaking bodies of the country know altogether too little about the science of government to act with the highest wisdom upon all questions that come before us. I say, without fear of offending my own constituents, that it is impracticable and unwise to refer matters of general legislation, such as criminal codes, and civil codes, and laws for taxation, and the creation of corporations, and the transmission of property, and legislation generally, to the people to be acted upon at the polls. It seems to me that it is an insult to the intelligence of the people to say to them that, while they do not have sense of discrimination enough to select honest, competent men from among their neighbors and acquaintances to represent them in a lawmaking body, they are capable, nevertheless, of understanding the problems involved in general lawmaking and can and will decide safely and intelligently at general elections what the law should be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This is a great problem, Mr. Chairman. It means more to this country than a mere experiment in the prospective State of Arizona. I am going to vote to approve the constitution. I am willing that Arizona shall try it, but I predict its failure wherever it is generally employed. Some of us can learn some things only by experience, and a large percentage of our people are determined to experiment with this the latest fad in politics. If Arizona does not prosper under it, some William Allen White will write in burning rhetoric upon the subject: "What's the matter with Arizona?" [Applause on the Republican side.]

The diagnosis will be tribuni plebis, meaning in English "demagogitis." [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. I am with you in spirit, but not on the Latin. [Laughter.]

Mr. PROUTY. There is too much Latin there. [Laughter.]

THE OREGON PLAN.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The provision in the Arizona constitution is copied almost verbatim from the constitution of the State of Oregon. The "Oregon plan" is paraded before the country to show how wisely laws are made under the initiative and referendum and how safe and conservative the people of Oregon have been in the face of provocation. I admit that the people of that State have shown more good sense in some instances than the legislature has. [Laughter.] There were 32 legislative propositions submitted to the voters for decision at the general election in November, 1910, along with the election of Congressmen and State and county officers. Eight of the propositions carried and 24 failed. Among other propositions submitted was an amendment to the constitution, proposed by the legislature, to abrogate the provision in the constitution which requires taxes to be equal and uniform. The legislature proposed that amendment to the State constitution. It had to be submitted to the voters for ratification or rejection. The vote upon it was—for, 37,619; against, 40,172. It was beaten in a vote of almost 80,000 by a narrow margin of 2,500.

Now, what does that mean? What does it signify? Equality and uniformity of taxation are inseparable from liberty and justice. Think of a State legislature in this country that will seek to make the taxing power an instrument of convenience to favor friends and punish enemies. Most of the great struggles for English liberty were waged over the taxing power. When our Government was ordained the rule of uniformity of taxation found its way into the Constitution, and it is one of the most potent safeguards of liberty and justice in that instrument. Taxation and representation in those days were vital questions. As Edmund Burke said, the wrong was not so much the weight of the tax as the weight of the preamble, asserting the power in the Parliament to impose taxes upon the Colonies without their consent. Uniformity has been the rule of taxation throughout this country. We have been governing Territories that have had no representation in Congress for more than a century; we have been taxing them without representation; but they were protected by the uniformity principle.

The people, through the Representatives, impose the taxes, and they must be uniform in all parts of the country. We can impose only such taxes on the Territories that are not represented in Congress as we voluntarily impose upon ourselves. The vital principle that taxes must be imposed by those who pay them is carried to the Territories through the uniformity rule. The good sense of the people saved the credit of the State of Oregon by rejecting the proposition to strike out of the constitution of that State the equality and uniformity rule. The amendment may be again submitted, and the small majority against it in 1910 may be converted into a majority in its favor at the next referendum. In that event taxation may run riot. There will be no guiding principle for the distribution of the burdens of government. It has been well said that the power to tax is the power to destroy. With no uniformity or equality of taxation, it may become a most dangerous and invidious agency for destruction.

Mr. LENROOT. I will ask the gentleman if it had not been for the referendum, might not taxation have run riot now?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think not. It is true the referendum saved the honor of Oregon at the election in 1910 and preserved the rule of equality and uniformity in the constitution.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. McCALL. Is it not probable that the Legislature of Oregon voted to submit that amendment to the people simply because there was a referendum?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was a proposition to amend the constitution and had to be submitted to the voters.

Mr. McCALL. Precisely upon that theory the Massachusetts Legislature submitted to the people a prohibitory amendment, on the theory that the people should have the right to pass upon it. The members of the legislature would not say that they believed in it, and the people finally rejected it, but it was simply to throw the responsibility for it upon the people.

CORRUPT LEGISLATURES.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Where the initiative and referendum is established it is because of a general suspicion of the integrity of members of the legislature. That is what prompts it. I do not know how comfortable a man in the Oregon Legislature may feel. He is not necessarily a criminal. He is nothing more than a suspect, to say the worst about him. An old lady received a letter from a son who many years before had gone into the far West. She had not heard from him for a number of years, until she received this particular letter. Among other things he wrote that he had been sent to the legislature. In relating it the mother said he did not say what he was sent up for, nor for how long, but she said with a sigh, "He is my boy, and I was glad to hear from him anyway." [Laughter.] It is not known whether the son lived in Oregon or not.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I should like to know if the gentleman is familiar with the object of the constitutional amendment in Oregon to which he has referred, with reference to uniformity of taxes?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know what the object was. I know what the effect would have been.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to state, without taking issue with the gentleman's argument at this time, that the object of that amendment was to authorize the single tax to be applied to Multnomah County as a test of it; that is, the result that would follow. I believe that the single tax as applied to Multnomah County will be a good thing. That county contains the most populous city in the State, and I believe it will be a good thing there.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The voters did not seem to think so, because a majority voted against it. I want to say that I do not believe a local matter of that kind is of sufficient importance to justify the legislature or the people of any State in destroying the guaranty of uniformity and equality in the assessment of taxes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. We had no such object as that in Oregon in passing this constitutional amendment, and we do not think that the amendment does authorize discrimination in taxation on the same class of property.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman stated a moment ago what the purpose was, but that is not the question. What the motive may have been is a matter of little consequence. The question is, What would have been the effect of what they seriously tried to do?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make this plain now, if the gentleman will permit. The object was to authorize taxes to be removed from personal property in Multnomah County, by a bill to be submitted at the next election, and Multnomah County will have to raise her taxes on real estate so as to contribute her proportionate share to the revenues of the State. In that way men can not hold 20 to 40 acres in the heart of the cities in Multnomah County, where we have people in tenement houses living in cramped conditions. They will have to improve the property if we put the taxes on the land.

Mr. MANN. Was that object stated in the matter that was submitted to a vote?

Mr. LAFFERTY. That object was stated in the discussions that took place.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, Mr. Chairman, the suggestions of the gentleman are hardly tenable, because it is not what the people intended, but it is what they actually proposed to do, for if they had amended the constitution as was proposed there would have been liberty to discriminate among taxpayers without hindrance. One industry could have been taxed out of existence to build up another, and so on. The purpose may have been good, but the proposition illustrates one of two things, either that the legislature was a guileless body or that there was a desire to use the taxing power for purposes contrary to principles of justice.

Mr. MANN. It illustrates the absurdity of the proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, was the amendment defeated?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. At a referendum?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Voted on by the people?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it does not follow, does it, that that is an illustration showing that the referendum and initiative is wrong? They seem to have come out all right with it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I stated a moment ago that it was beaten at the polls, and I said that the people displayed better judgment than the legislature; but it was beaten in an aggregate vote of 80,000 by only 2,500 majority. At the next election it may succeed. It illustrates the danger of submitting matters of such vital importance to the common welfare to the fate of the ballot. That is where the danger lies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman, he is criticizing the Legislature of Oregon for submitting that amendment. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is his opinion that the legislature, the majority that voted to submit the amendment, really believed in the amendment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I presume they did or they would not have submitted it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not true that constitutional amendments may be submitted by a legislature when there is a considerable demand, and that an amendment may be submitted by legislators who are not themselves in favor of the proposed amendment?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I presume that is the case.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman is discussing this referendum of a constitutional amendment, and I wish to ask him whether his own State of Indiana has not now and always has had a referendum for exactly similar propositions?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have the referendum for constitutional amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. That was what this was.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. FERRIS. The thought I have is this: The gentleman indicts the people and indicts the initiative and referendum on the theory that the voters seem to have voted on an amendment that is personally objectionable to him. Now, why does not the same indictment lie more directly against the legislature that submitted it than against the people who defeated it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have already said that, in my opinion, the people of Oregon showed better judgment than the legislature did in this instance.

Mr. FERRIS. Why does not that explode the gentleman's theory?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The mere fact that a question of that nature will come so near carrying by a popular vote is a serious thing.

Mr. FERRIS. It did carry in the representative body.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They can not amend a constitution except by referendum in many of the States, although there are some States where they make constitutions without consulting the people at all. The reason that is urged for the referendum is the alleged venality of the legislators. It is insisted that the people can not trust the men they select from among their neighbors and acquaintances to make laws, therefore they should make their own laws at popular elections.

They tell us that the people are honest and wise, that the country is full of honest, capable men, but men selected for the legislature can not be trusted. It seems strange that so many communities should select about the only rogues they have for their representatives in the legislatures. I do not believe they do. I believe most men in public office are honest and trustworthy. I think the corruption of legislative bodies is greatly exaggerated. But there is altogether too much of it. A member of a legislature or of any other body in which is reposed a discretion to be exercised on behalf of the people who corruptly violates his trust commits the most insidious, the most execrable crime that is possible to commit against society and government. [Applause.] Its effect is to destroy confidence in public men and in popular institutions. The people are not always able to discriminate between the honest and the dishonest, and the honest suffer for the sins of the dishonest. There ought to be as much candor and honesty in politics as there is in any of the business relations of life. [Applause.]

A candidate for office who will deceive and mislead the people in order to get their votes can not be trusted in public office. He ought not to be trusted in any capacity. I do not know that the law can impose more effective penalties against corrupt officeholders, but they ought to be branded with eternal infamy. Over 200 years ago Scotland outlawed one of her troublesome clans, and enacted a law making it a crime for anyone to write, print, or speak in an audible tone the name of the clan or of any of its members. If we could devise a method of emphasizing the odium of dishonest officials, it would be well to do it.

The strength of this Government is not in its Army and Navy. It is in the reverence and affection the people have for government and free institutions, and when that reverence is destroyed by official corruption our bond of unity and cohesion is a rope of sand. When the laws are wise and just and are honestly administered, there is not an able-bodied man under the folds of the flag that would not shoulder a gun and stand in the face of danger and death if necessary for the preservation of the Government. But when the public mind has become saturated with the suspicion that the Government is honeycombed with rottenness and corruption patriotism is at a low ebb. Who among us would hasten to grasp his gun and fight in defense of a "jack-pot" government? [Applause.]

I submit these observations, gentlemen, to emphasize the enormity of crimes against official honesty. But they can not be cured by the referendum. This is a Government of the people. They are the sovereigns. It is their Government, and they can never hope for the highest standard of honesty and efficiency in the public service until they devote more attention to nominations and elections and to public affairs generally. They must hold every public official to a strict accountability for the honest performance of his duties.

Mr. LAFFERTY rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair). Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to inquire what the gentleman means by a "jack-pot" government? I am not familiar with that term.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I can not speak with precision about it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Nobody can open it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I assume that it means the "anti-social" method of making and administering laws. It is a technical term borrowed from the same science that contributed the word "standpatism" to our political vocabulary, although I understand that "jackpotism" is worse even than "standpatism." [Laughter.]

We have spasms of virtue in this country. When public sentiment is aroused and people look after public men and public affairs, representative government is honest, clean, and efficient; there are no corruptionists in public life. When the people are indifferent, when they stay in their offices and factories and on the farms and give no attention to nominations and elections, dishonest men will occasionally get into office and perpetrate crimes. Public corruptionists flourish when the people devote their time and thought to their individual interests and give no attention to the cause of government.

If you have the referendum, it will be a failure from your own standpoint in the absence of a vigilant, persistent public opinion to back it up. That kind of a public opinion is all that is needed to make representative government efficient, honest, and clean. There can be no satisfactory administration of popular government unless the people do their part. They must see that honest and capable men are elected to office.

If dishonest and incapable men are chosen to responsible public positions, the voters are chiefly responsible for the consequences.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT in the chair). Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has asserted that which it seems to me is a truism and of which everybody recognizes the truth, that in the people is the fundamental right to do things. Now, does not the gentleman think that reposing in the people the power as given in the referendum and initiative would stimulate greater vigilance on their part?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would not have that tendency. The voters can select honest, capable men among their acquaintances without great difficulty and secure good legislators. Men who are honest and upright in all the walks of life can be trusted in public office. But the average voter is too busily employed in his personal affairs to study the science of government, to investigate economic and political questions to such an extent that he can act with wisdom in making laws. The average voter does not always know what the existing laws are nor how a proposed measure would operate in practical affairs. The result would be he would not attempt to inform himself on those questions and would be indifferent about voting upon proposed measures. I say this with no disposition to disparage the intelligence of the voters, but I state it as a truth that all level-headed citizens understand perfectly well.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will yield right there a moment, I would like to say that although there are few of us who believe in the initiative and referendum who advocate a pure democracy, we do advocate the safeguards which the initiative and referendum impose upon representative government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a "safeguard" that tends to weaken and destroy popular government. If the initiative and referendum shall come into general use in making laws the principle of the infallibility of the majority will follow, and constitutions will be cast aside as an incumbrance. Vox populi, vox Dei. The divine right of the majority will become the basis of government. The voice of the people is the voice of God only when it speaks the language of truth and justice and liberty and humanity. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE DIVINE RIGHT OF THE MAJORITY.

The doctrine of the infallibility of the majority is a dangerous political heresy. It inevitably leads to the overthrow of all limitations on the powers of government. If majorities can make no mistakes, there can be no need for constitutions when laws are made directly by the people. The laws will be right simply because they will have the sanction of the majority behind them. The Declaration of Independence proclaims that all men are created equal and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, and that it is the paramount duty of government to safeguard the citizen in the enjoyment of those rights.

There is a latitude of liberty that belongs to every citizen in virtue of his manhood that no power on earth can justly take from him. This liberty is essential to his growth and development and to the fulfillment of that destiny which is appointed to him by the God who created him. Government and laws and institutions are ordained for the protection of the citizen in those fundamental rights. It is as great a wrong for the Government itself to invade those natural rights as it is for the assassin or the highwayman or a band of conspirators to do so. Those rights do not emanate from government, but it is the vital purpose of government to protect the citizens in their proper enjoyment. It is as great an offense against manhood and civilization for those rights to be invaded or destroyed by a majority vote in a democracy as it is to invade or destroy them by the edict of an absolute monarch.

The essential liberties of the people are secured by absolute limitations upon the power of government. It is the office of the constitution to embody those limitations and the duty of the executive officers and of the courts to enforce them. They are of especial importance to the weak and the poor, for the strong and the rich are better able to take care of themselves. There can be no liberty in the real sense unless the government is effectively denied the power to invade the inalienable rights of the citizen.

It was the boast of Lord Chatham that English liberties were so secure that the humblest subject of the King was supreme in his own dwelling place; that his house might be so poor that the winds could shake it and the rains drive through the roof, yet the King himself dare not enter it unbidden. It is more than a matter of mere sentiment that the humblest citizen of this great Republic can stand in God's sunlight in the consciousness that he is the possessor of certain rights and liberties that the Government, with all its wealth and power, can not take from him.

Liberty is not a matter of grace; it is an inherent right; and history abounds in illustrations of the truth that real liberty is secure only where the Government is powerless to invade it. There is as much, if not greater need of limitations on the power of government in pure democracies as in monarchies.

There is no despotism in history more cruel and merciless than the despotism of an unbridled majority. It carries no individual responsibility. A monarch who has unlimited power carries the responsibility for its exercise. Irresponsible power is always liable to abuse. While under normal conditions the people are conservative and their purposes and impulses are good, there are times when public feeling becomes greatly excited and a frenzy of passion will sweep over the country with the fury of a cyclone. It is under such conditions that representative constitutional government is necessary to protect free institutions.

These seem to be plain observations to make in public by one who represents the people and who, if he comes back here, will have to go to the people for approval. But I would be willing to make this speech in every county in my congressional district, and I am confident it would have the indorsement and approval of four out of five of the people without regard to party. [Applause on the Republican side.] Level-headed men know what they can do and what they can not do wisely in connection with public affairs. They know that general law-making by the people through the agency of the ballot is impracticable and must break down with its own weight. I believe in primary election laws, properly safeguarded with efficient corrupt-practices acts, and I believe in extending the civil-service method of selecting public servants to State, county, and municipal governments wherever it is practicable. I believe in taking patronage and jobs and contracts for public work altogether out of politics. That will destroy the cohesive force that cements and holds corrupt political machines together. [Applause on the Republican side.] If that be done, the power of the corrupt boss will be gone. Let the people be more vigilant and active at primaries and elections.

They must exercise care in selecting honest, capable men to represent them in the Government service. If they do that, there will be little reason to complain of the laws or their administration. There will be no calling for the self-selected champion of the cause of the "dear people," to advocate political nostrums and fakir remedies that tend to undermine social and political institutions that have the sanction of centuries of wisdom and experience.

I have faith in the sturdy, common sense of the people, and therefore I do not believe the institution of the initiative and referendum will ever come into general use in this country. If, under the influence of political reforms, it should be generally established by law, its impracticability and unwisdom would become apparent to the average man, and it would become innocuous by disuse. Every law providing for the referendum requires a majority of the votes cast, not at the election, but upon the particular measure submitted to carry it.

There is a general disposition on the part of the voter to refrain from voting upon proposed laws. The vote is significantly small on legislative matters. It is exceedingly rare that a proposition receives the support of a majority of the voters of a State, and in some instances laws have been enacted by the referendum by less than 10 per cent of the whole number of voters. Those who are specially interested in the proposed measure vote, while the great body of the voters are indifferent.

This is a perfectly natural result, because most of the voters do not have the time nor opportunity to inform themselves respecting legislative measures submitted to them for consideration, and rather than vote unintelligently they will not vote at all. The referendum, from the practical viewpoint, is not legislation by the voters, but legislation by a small minority of the voters who are interested specially in the measures submitted for action.

THE RECALL.

I do not believe in the recall for public officers, because it is fundamentally wrong. It is not based on justice or merit. I believe in a good, efficient law for the removal of corrupt or inefficient public officers by a proceeding in a court of justice or before a civil-service board, where charges can be investigated and decided upon their merits. Last week, in one of the cities in my district, a court removed the chief of police on the charge of dishonesty and inefficiency. It only required a few days to make the investigation. The law in Indiana provides for a summary proceeding in charges against public officers, and they are conducted under established rules and decided according to law and justice, rather than upon considerations of politics or by whim and caprice, which are sure to influence results under the recall plan.

The chief of police of the city mentioned would, in all probability, have won in a recall proceeding, without regard to his fitness, for he would have had the support of all of the so-called liberal element of the city.

Under the recall there would be as many good, efficient officers retired because they enforced the law as there would be dishonest and incompetent officers retired because they did not enforce the law. Suppose a petition were filed for the recall of Judge Blair, in Adams County, Ohio. He would doubtless be opposed by every voter in that county who has been indicted in his court for selling his vote, and the records show that a majority of all the voters were so indicted. The judge would stand a poor show of vindication. In a great many cities throughout the country it would be much easier to recall an officer who fearlessly performs his duty than one who acquiesces in lawbreaking. That is not the case in all the cities, and perhaps it is not in a majority of them. I was told a few days ago that the voters of the city of Tacoma, in the State of Washington, recalled their mayor because he refused to allow a prize fight to take place in the city.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Seattle.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is there a proposition pending for the recall of the mayor of Tacoma?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Because he would not allow a prize fight?

Mr. LAFFERTY. No; I do not understand that to be the ground.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The law of the State of Washington does not permit prize fights, and an organization of the sporting element of Tacoma arranged to supply the people with that luxury regardless of the law. The mayor thought the law was made to be obeyed, and he refused to allow the prize fight to take place. Indignant citizens of Tacoma at once filed a petition for the recall of the mayor for his interference with their liberties, and the vote was had a few days ago and the mayor was removed from his office by a large majority. I suppose prize fights will be a common entertainment in Tacoma in the future. No law officer will dare interfere with them.

Elections for the recall of officers are not decided on their merits. It often happens that very efficient executive officers possess very few popular qualities, and such officers are always at a great disadvantage in a contest against a man of the "hail-fellow-well-met" type, who promises every voter everything he wants. Considerations of politics, personality, affability, and many others of an unsubstantial character often control in local elections.

The application of the recall to the judiciary is a grave menace to the integrity and independence of the courts. I have great respect for the courts and high regards for most of the judges. Occasionally a weak judge may be selected and occasionally a strong judge may make a mistake in the decision of a question of law or fact. But in the main, judges of our courts are able, honest, fearless men. The courts are the bulwark of free institutions; they are the citadel of liberty and justice; and they must always be free to administer law and justice without fear or favor. Under the elective system they should be especially protected against the baleful influence of party politics. The tendency of the recall applied to the judiciary would be to make cowards and sycophants of judges. The equation of public sentiment would enter more or less into the decision of every question of general importance. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] in his speech the other day said he believed the courts ought to consider the public in the administration of the law. I agree that courts ought to discharge their duties in an honest and fearless manner; but they do not make the law; they only decide what it is and apply it to concrete cases. If the law is imperfect, it should be amended by the lawmaking branch of the Government. Courts are often criticized for the faults of the legislatures. They are condemned for adhering to well-established precedents and long-settled principles, and yet there can be no uniformity or stability of law if they pursued any other policy. The tendency of the recall will be to overthrow uniformity and stability in the laws. There will doubtless be honest and fearless men on the bench in Arizona under the recall, but the tendency will be to keep men of independence and self-respect out of the judiciary. With a weak man on the bench the wealthy influential litigant will have a distinct advantage over his poor and less influential adversary.

The plain citizen who seeks nothing but what is his just and legal right is more vitally interested in the honesty and independence of the courts than is the wealthy and influential citizen who employs the courts to obtain some advantage that is not rightly and justly his. The courts, above all things, should be kept free from the influence of politicians and political bosses. They should also be deaf to popular clamor. What would be thought of a proposition authorizing an appeal from important decisions of courts to the people to be decided at popular elections? It is said that the people are fully competent to enact laws of all kinds by referendum. Why are they not competent to decide what the law is by referendum? No citizen would favor such a radical and destructive policy as that, and yet it is proposed to give the voters the power to recall judges if they do not decide the law as the voters think it ought to be decided.

The people of Arizona, judging from their constitution, desire to have their courts administer the law under the influence of the recall. I do not know what they will do if they have an opportunity to vote on that proposition separately. Arizona will soon be a sovereign State, and may establish such institutions as she pleases without consulting the other States, provided they do not conflict with the Federal Constitution.

Our system of government, Federal and State, is admirably adapted to the needs of the country, with its great area, its diversified climate and resources, and its large population. It has worked well for a century and a quarter of political life.

One of England's greatest statesmen referred to the Constitution of the United States as "the most important work that was ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

The course of human history is strewn with the ruins of monarchies that crumbled and fell because they gave no liberties to the people. They are alternated with the wrecks of democracies that perished from the earth because they lacked the qualities of stability and endurance. The patriot fathers who framed our Government profited by the lessons of history and combined in its groundwork ample safeguards for the liberties of the citizen, with abundant securities for the strength and permanence of its institutions. This Government is no longer an experiment. It is the best-balanced Government civilized man has ever known. It embodies the principle of growth and expansion and adapts itself to the needs and wants of a progressive people. It is fundamentally representative in character. Its laws are made by a body of responsible citizens selected by the voters because of their capacity and qualifications for that important work. That feature can not be overthrown without destroying the equilibrium of political forces underlying the system and causing destruction of the whole fabric. Our besetting danger is not from without, but from within. The corrupting influences of human greed, the insidious arts of the conscienceless demagogue, and the impracticable dreams of the doctrinaire must be guarded against by a vigilant and discriminating public opinion or our institutions will be destroyed. Republican government was established at too great a sacrifice of blood and treasure to be exposed to the whims and vagaries of political quackery or to the destructive power of selfish interests. Let the imperishable principles of the Declaration of Independence shine through our constitutions and laws and illuminate the pathway of progress, and the destiny of the Republic will be secure. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, by this measure provision is made to admit to statehood Arizona and New Mexico, being the last Territories in the contiguous stretch of continental United States to be admitted to the sisterhood of States.

My sympathies are in favor of their admission. I have always believed, and now believe, in the right of local self-government as a fundamental part of our political life. Whenever the people of any Territory are able and willing to bear the expense and responsibilities of statehood they should have the right to elect their own officers and to govern themselves, subject only to the common bond of the Federal Union. This includes the right to form a constitution satisfactory to themselves and suitable to their needs.

I am not at all sure that the power vested by the Federal Constitution in the Congress of the United States will permit this body, on account of the individual views of its Members on governmental questions, to infringe upon that right of local self-government.

I have no doubt that all inconsistencies or defects, if such exist, in the proposed constitutions will be cheerfully remedied by the people of the respective Territories and the admission as free and independent members of the Union happily consummated. I hope that two new stars will soon blaze forth in our national flag. [Applause.]

It is impossible for a Representative from the Commonwealth of Missouri to approach the consideration of this question without being reminded of the remarkable part which Missouri has played in the acquisition, settlement, and development of these Territories. They are the twin daughters of the old Commonwealth of Missouri; that Commonwealth which has played the part of mother to all the great States of the trans-Mississippi country. Missouri is the mother of empires. She is, and has been from the days of her earliest infancy, a land of daring, enterprise, and romance. Her history is a rich field for the future statesman, historian, and poet.

She is, to the trans-Mississippi country, the starting point of all civilization and progress; the Plymouth Rock and the Jamestown of our western history.

She contained within herself the seed of the manifest destiny which carried the American flag from ocean to ocean.

Missouri's connection with the history of New Mexico, embracing originally Arizona, was the necessary result of the position which she held with relation to all the territory west of the Mississippi. She is not the eldest child of the Louisiana Purchase, but her central position at the juncture of the great Missouri Valley with the Mississippi, made her the center of civilization, the starting point of all exploration and development. Besides dominating and developing the Louisiana Purchase she helped to add three empires to the American flag, Texas, Oregon, and California, with all of the States that have been carved from them. This year, 1911, which witnesses the coming of age of the last of her daughters, the twin Commonwealths New Mexico and Arizona, is the one hundredth anniversary of the year when Missouri herself was erected into a self-governing Territory. In 1811, just 100 years ago, the name Missouri was first applied to a definite district. [Applause.] She is celebrating her own struggles toward self-government in commemorating the triumph of her twin daughters.

The earliest settlement of white men on Missouri soil was at St. Genevieve, by the French in 1735, 40 years before Bunker Hill. In quick succession St. Charles and St. Louis were founded. These French were hunters, trappers, and small farmers of a simple, brave, and pastoral character. They dealt with the Indians without fraud and without bloodshed, and probably saved the young community from the horrors of the Indian massacres which have so stained the early progress of all of the other American States. Although Louisiana passed legally under the rule of Spain in 1763, yet her character and institutions remained French of the best provincial type.

In 1797 the wilderness hunter, Daniel Boone, who had already performed marvels of human endurance and daring in his exploration of Kentucky and Tennessee, was invited to Missouri. He agreed with the Spanish governor to bring a colony of Americans and settle them west of the Mississippi, and he kept his agreement. His settlement was in what is now Warren County, about 20 miles west of St. Louis, and was considered a remote outpost of the white man. This tiny settlement, however, was the beacon light which proclaimed to all the world that the American had crossed the Mississippi, and that there was no stopping place and no turning back for the restless tide of civilization. [Applause.]

When the infant Missouri had scarcely learned to toddle she was already rambling over the plains and exploring the lands of the West. In 1804 Daniel Boone's two sons learned of a salt lick 150 miles to the westward, up the great Missouri Valley. Salt was then as precious as gold to the early pioneer and was worth risking life and fortune for. The same year that the American flag was raised over upper Louisiana the two brothers were manufacturing salt at Boone's lick, in what is now known as Howard County. The wilderness was being conquered step by step. In 1805 upper Louisiana, which was originally attached to Indiana Territory, was detached and given a separate governor, although without the right of self-government. Americans began to pour in by the thousands. The peaceful and pastoral French were astonished by these eager, land-hungry, speculating, boisterous Americans. Before the change of Government land had been free and could be had for the asking without survey and without fencing; now land values began to soar, surveys must be made, formal grants and deeds were demanded, and speculation was rife. The restless and insatiable passion of the Anglo-Saxon for land and for speculation was running its riot in the blood of all western pioneers.

A few days ago a great newspaper of the West published a fanciful sketch portraying what might have happened if Jefferson had been a standpatter and had refused to embrace the opportunity to acquire the Louisiana purchase. It presents an attractive field for fancy, but Jefferson was not a standpatter. He was keenly alive to the irresistible sweep of American destiny.

Those who have represented Jefferson as being reluctantly forced by circumstances into the Louisiana purchase have made a great historical mistake. His whole soul was in it, and he saw with the eyes of a statesman the uncontrollable impulse that would carry Americans beyond any artificial barriers that might be erected by law.

In May, 1804, under the active direction of President Jefferson, Lewis and Clark left St. Louis and, with a tiny band of daring white men, explored the Missouri River to its farthest source, nestling under the peaks of the Rockies, 1,900 miles away. They then advanced across the frozen passes and through barren sierras down to the valley of the Columbia, and gazed out upon the Pacific Ocean, like new Balboas, bearing not bloodshed, but peace and progress, science and civilization. [Applause.] These two heroes and their little band returned to St. Louis in the summer of 1806, and transmitted to President Jefferson a faithful and accurate report of their journey. Meriwether Lewis had been his private secretary. The whole expedition was the personal work of Jefferson. This report, which time has shown to have been singularly free from the almost universal fault of explorers—boastful lying and exaggerated misstatement—has been of incalculable value to the Nation. It told of a new world and rang like a clarion note in the ears of every enterprising American youth.

In 1805-6 another hardy spirit, Zebulon Pike, started from St. Louis, and explored, in turn, the headwaters of the Mississippi, the headwaters of the Red River, and the passes of the Rocky Mountains. In 1808 Fort Osage was established on the Missouri River, in what is now Jackson County, within 20 miles of the present site of Kansas City, and George C. Sibley was placed in charge, as agent, to trade with the Indians. In the same year the first newspaper west of the Mississippi was established at St. Louis—the Missouri Gazette, now the St. Louis Republic. By 1810 extensive settlements of Kentuckians were being made in the very heart of Missouri, in what came to be known as Boone's Lick country, now comprised in Howard and Cooper Counties. These settlers were the highest type of American pioneers—men who feared neither man nor nature, who were equal to any combat, who brought their families and their live stock, as well as their rifles and their axes; men who could build their own houses, kill their own food, raise their own crops, protect their own homes, and govern their own community. The world has probably never seen a higher development of the possibilities of the Anglo-Saxon race for native resourcefulness and self-reliance.

At this time the infant Commonwealth began to long for self-government, and chafed under a rule which was practically that of a military governor. It was not possible for men of such ideals to submit long to a government by appointment. We find that a sterling Democratic Congressman, Hon. John Rhea, of Tennessee, appeared as the champion and spokesman for the infant Commonwealth. I will quote some interesting extracts from the annals of Congress:

On November 8, 1811: On motion of Mr. Rhea, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of Louisiana, presented on the 6th day of January, 1810, was referred to a select committee.

On Thursday, November 14, 1811: Mr. Rhea, chairman of the committee appointed on the 8th instant, presented a bill for the government of the Territory of Louisiana, which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On Thursday, December 5, 1811: The Speaker laid before the House sundry resolutions adopted at the meeting of a number of the inhabitants of the city of St. Louis, in the Territory of Louisiana, expressive of their wishes that the second grade of Territorial government may be extended to the said Territory; that the judges of the general court be required by law to have some permanent interest in the welfare of the inhabitants and to reside in the Territory; that additional and more equitable provisions be made in favor of the claimants to the lands in the Territory; and that the limits of the Territory may be more clearly defined, which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the government of said Territory.

This has the genuine American ring, and is the sturdy demand of free men for self-government. Notice that they are tired of absentee officials and want their rulers to be compelled to reside in the Territory and have some permanent interest therein. This movement was not without opposition, however, as is shown by the following extract of December 7, 1811:

Mr. Pleasants presented a remonstrance to a petition of sundry inhabitants of St. Louis, in the Territory of Louisiana, stating the many injuries and inconveniences which would result from a change in their form of government, and praying that no alteration be made in their said form of government. Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the government of said Territory.

Notice that the standpatter was present even then. You have seen him in this debate all the way through; men who do not want any change in any form of government and do not want anything new tried.

However, the movement went steadily forward. On April 1, 1812—

The House resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting the government of Louisiana. Mr. Rhea moved to amend the bill by striking out sixty thousand—the number of souls entitling the Territory in the future to become a State—and to insert in lieu thereof thirty-five thousand; motion negatived. The committee arose without debate and reported the bill with its amendment, in which the House concurred. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for the third reading.

On April 9, 1812—

The House proceeded to consider the engrossed bill providing for the government of the Territory of Louisiana, when Mr. McKee moved that said bill be postponed until the first Monday in December next; negatived. The question was then taken that the said bill do pass; and resolved in the affirmative.

On May 21, 1812—

The amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for the government of the Territory of Louisiana were read and concurred in with an amendment.

And thus upper Louisiana, or a portion thereof, became a Territory of the second grade under the name of Missouri. At this time Congress recognized three grades of Territories. The lowest form of government, which had existed in Upper Louisiana previous to this time, was that of a governor and three judges, appointed by the President, who exercised supreme executive, legislative, and judicial power. The second grade of government, which was created by the act of 1812, established a separate judiciary, and provided that the lower branch of the legislative assembly be elected by the people; the upper branch, or council, remaining appointive.

The year 1811 is memorable also for another thing. In December of that year, while the people of the infant Territory were clamoring for self-government, that they might conquer the wilderness, a tremendous force was coming to their aid. The steamer New Orleans, the first steamboat ever built west of the Allegheny Mountains, made a successful trip by inland water from Pittsburg to New Orleans. The power of steam was about to invade the West. The day of the flatboat and the dugout canoe was over—savagery must roll back beaten in the unequal strife with civilization and inventive genius.

The War of 1812 with England could not disturb the far-off settlements west of the Mississippi, but the close of that struggle and the weight that it lifted from the breasts of the American people, accelerated the wave of progress and immigration. By 1815 a steady stream of American immigrants, mainly from the South, was pouring into the West. This year a road, known as the Boones Lick Road, was surveyed from St. Charles to Old Franklin.

Up that road came the advancing army of immigration—mule teams, horse teams, ox teams, handcarts—everything that could carry men, women, and children and household goods. Ahead marched the sovereign of the little family kingdom, with his rifle on his shoulder, ready to subdue the wilderness.

In 1816 Missouri was advanced to the third and highest grade of Territory. By this change she was given the right to elect both branches of her legislative assembly and to engage in general legislation necessary to self-government. The first act of her new legislature was to adopt in large measure the statutes of Virginia. In so doing she adopted also, by formal act, the common law of England as the basis of her jurisprudence. This act is memorable, for it was the first time that the common law had thus been planted by the free will of a self-governing people upon alien soil. The original British territory in America, embraced within the Thirteen Colonies, extended, at least by a fiction of law, as far west as the Mississippi River. The eastern half of the United States may be said to have acquired the common law of England as a part of its colonial inheritance, but our Missouri immigrants carried this great body of the law across the Mississippi to a land where it had never existed and supplanted with it the Spanish law there dominant. By the statute of 1816 Missouri adopted the common law of England and all acts of Parliament of a general nature, not local to the Kingdom of Great Britain, passed prior to the fourth year of the reign of James I. As you know, the fourth year of James I was 1606, one year prior to the first permanent settlement of Englishmen within the bounds of the United States at Jamestown, Va. We took our common law direct from the pure fountain head as it existed before the Colonies were established, unpolluted by the colonial strife and discrimination which followed.

In 1817, on the 2d of August, the steamer General Pike arrived at St. Louis, and navigation of the Mississippi by steam was an accomplished fact. Two years later, in May 1819, the steamboat Independence first disturbed the age-long solitude of the Missouri River and made a successful trip from St. Louis to Franklin. This was the year of the great financial stringency, but it could not affect men who raised more than they could eat and who were living in a land of abundance, where the gratification of their physical wants was a sure reward of energy and courage. The great need of these men was transportation, and the scream of the steam whistle answered the cry of their souls for some power to take their goods out to the market and to bring in the refinements of civilization.

Statehood was the next demand. On August 10, 1821, Missouri was admitted into the Union after a bitter contest that shook American institutions to their very foundations. She continued the storm center of political life for 40 years. The political strife in which she was born and in which she grew and strengthened never for one moment, however, checked her onward advance, either in internal development or in her dominating influence over the settlement of the West. The first constitution of Missouri, framed in 1820, was a marvel of constitution making. It was drafted by a convention of 41 members, who met in St. Louis and worked for one month. The total expense of the convention was $26.25 for stationery, and it framed a constitution which took effect without submission to the people and governed the State for 45 years.

The lusty infant had now grown to maturity. Missouri was a State and could enter upon her career of empire building.

The first act of the new State legislature was to elect two brilliant men to the United States Senate, David Barton and Thomas H. Benton.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am ordinarily very glad to yield, but I intend to get through within the time allotted to me, and therefore I will ask the gentleman to excuse me at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BORLAND. Benton's power as an orator, his tireless energy, his tremendous personal force, his indomitable will, his intense democracy, and, above all, his wonderful faith in the manifest destiny of the West made him one of the remarkable characters of American history. Such qualities would balance more faults than Benton possessed. For 30 years he stood in the Senate as the champion of the great West. He was the incarnate voice of the West, with its great needs and its restless power. Daily he fought its battles in that arena of intellectual gladiators. [Applause.] To him the manifest destiny that should carry our flag from ocean to ocean was no idle fancy; it was a religion; he lived it in every fiber of his intense nature. The West owes him a debt which has never been measured, and no historian has yet done justice to the matchless services to the Union of Thomas H. Benton. [Applause.]

About the year 1821 the first successful expedition is said to have been made to New Mexico over the Santa Fe Trail by one William Becknell, from the town of Old Franklin. There may have been earlier expeditions—Becknell's claim to fame is disputed—but it is certain that by the year 1822 the Santa Fe Trail was well established. It then had its northern terminus at Independence, in Jackson County, Mo. For a quarter of a century this great international highway stretched its 900 miles across the blazing plains between the little Missouri village and the strange land to the southwest. It had a peculiar attraction for the ambitious, the resolute, and the daring. The men who operated this wonderful traffic were drawn from the pioneer life of Missouri. Their vocation made demands upon them which have rarely been equaled in human history. This was no place for the weakling, the indolent, or the vicious. When a train was ready to start from Independence on its long and perilous journey it must be manned by a crew of picked men. No superfluous men could be carried and no unnecessary mouths could be fed. The combination of qualities demanded of these men was surprising. They must be riflemen, quick, cool, and unerring, absolute strangers to fear, yet cautious and watchful as the savage; they must be teamsters, skilled in the knowledge of horseflesh, able to care for their beasts, not only with the broad sympathy of the true horseman, but with the consciousness that their very lives depended upon the safety and efficiency of the horses; they must be men of powerful muscle, able to handle tremendous loads of freight and to pack and repack the great wagons; they must be plainsmen and skilled in all knowledge of woodcraft, able to track their way across the boundless deserts and read the wilderness like an open book; they must be merchants, able to judge correctly what goods could be profitably carried and what the trade demanded, and of sufficient skill and education to balance the expenses, profits, losses, and risks of the enterprise; they must be self-reliant in every emergency and patient in every adversity, surmounting with indomitable will dangers and difficulties impossible to foresee or to estimate. Romance can find no richer field than this marvelous old trail, which has no counterpart in the history of the world, has never had, and can never have. It is one of those brilliant pictures which adorn the gallery of history, whose colors will fade unless they are caught and fixed by the gifted hand of some master genius. In this Santa Fe Trail is found the key of the subsequent exploration and development of the West. It was the cradle of daring, of enterprise, and of liberty. The men who made it were the men who won and who governed in the rapidly succeeding years great Commonwealths and who brought vast empires under the Stars and Stripes.

In 1824–25 an event occurred of tremendous importance to the young State of Missouri. A celebrated German author by the name of Gottfried Duden traveled through St. Charles, Warren, and Montgomery Counties, in Missouri, in company with Daniel M. Boone, a son of the great hunter. On his return to Germany Herr Duden wrote a very remarkable book describing the new country. This book directed the attention of all intelligent Germans to this country, with the result that an enormous German immigration set in to that part of Missouri. Germans are proverbial home makers and home builders. With their integrity and their thrift they add enormously to the stability of any community. From that day to this German immigration to Missouri has been a steady stream. The German immigrants, unlike some late comers from other countries, are home makers who become at once a part of their adopted State. They are not of the transient, shifting species, but every German family is an addition to the economic strength of the community. This visit of an intellectual German to America has had a far-reaching influence on the history of Missouri, to which but little credit has been attached.

From 1822 to 1836 the great empire of Texas was being reclaimed by Americans who were largely Missourians. Old Moses Austin undertook the first plan to take American settlers into Texas. He returned to his home in Missouri, where he died, and is buried near the beautiful city of Potosi, in Washington County. His work was taken up by his son, Stephen F. Austin, who became a leader in the subsequent fight for freedom of Texas and a hero among the race of heroes which that giant land called forth. During these years thousands of Missourians poured into Texas, until at the time that Texas achieved her independence, in 1835, it was said that there was scarcely a family in Missouri that did not have one or more of its members in Texas.

In 1836, through the efforts of Senators Benton and Linn, the Platte purchase was added to Missouri to extend her northwest corner to the Missouri River. This was done in spite of the Missouri compromise, which provided that no more slave territory should be added north of the southern boundary of Missouri. This is probably the richest section of its size in the State, or in the entire country. It contains one town, an agricultural town of 900 inhabitants, which is the richest community per capita in the world. Platte City has a wealth of $1,000 for every man, woman, child, or baby in its limits.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is that wealth well distributed?

Mr. BORLAND. I think it is well distributed. There are no poor people in Platte City, and I doubt if there are any very rich people. I know there are no millionaires.

In 1837 Col. Gentry assembled his Missouri regiment at Columbia and marched to the Seminole war in Florida. In this year, also, a general panic swept over the United States. The Whigs were not slow to attribute this panic to the existing Democratic administration and the fight which it had made upon the Bank of the United States five years before. On this issue they carried the election all over the country in the succeeding presidential campaign of 1840. We now know that the panic was caused by an era of overspeculation and frenzied finance such as has been the cause of every panic this country has ever suffered. As Missouri had not indulged in any overspeculation or frenzied finance, as she had not pledged her credit in wildcat schemes to irresponsible promoters, she was not severely affected by the panic. The Whigs were not successful in Missouri; she remained true to the pole star of her Democratic faith.

About this time there came upon the stage of western history a romantic character—the brilliant young explorer, John C. Frémont, whose name is inseparably linked with the great work of empire building. Frémont was a young Army officer, who won the love of as brilliant a woman as America has ever produced—Jessie Benton, the daughter of Missouri's great Senator. In 1838–39 Frémont had begun his career as an under officer in the exploration party of the country lying between the upper Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers. This expedition was successful, and its results were valuable. He returned to St. Louis and had just reached the happy climax of his courtship of Miss Benton when he received an order to explore the sources of the Des Moines River. His sweetheart bade him go, as she did on every subsequent occasion when duty and fame were beckoning to him. He made this trip in 1841. The next year—1842—he encountered in St. Louis that dauntless young Missourian, Kit Carson. Carson had been brought as a baby 1 year old from Kentucky to Howard County, Mo., and grew up in the Boones Lick country. When a mere boy he left there, drawn by the powerful fascination of the Santa Fe Trail, and for many years was the foremost explorer and the most daring plainsman of all the West. Upon his meeting with Frémont in St. Louis he became the guide of Frémont's exploration of the Rocky Mountains. In 1843 Frémont made his third expedition. He says that he started from "the little town of Kansas on the Missouri frontier" and explored the route to Oregon and California. This is probably the first mention in history of "the little town of Kansas," now the great metropolis of Kansas City, on the Missouri border.

Missouri was called upon at this time to bear the brunt of the fight for Oregon. When the Santa Fe Trail became well established from Independence one branch of it ran northwest to Oregon. For 100 miles west from Independence the Oregon Trail was identical with the Santa Fe Trail. It is said that at this point there was a stake driven into the ground, upon which was a small board bearing the simple words "Road to Oregon." This was an offhand way of mentioning the fact that 2,100 miles away were the boundless resources of an unknown country. Over this trail the restless Americans pressed on. The country vaguely known as Oregon, and which embraced the three great States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, was occupied under a joint claim of title by the United States and Great Britain. As long as it was unknown and presumably worthless this vague claim was sufficient, but when the pathfinder had blazed the way it was no longer unknown to the Americans. In 1842 a huge caravan of over 1,000 Americans made the journey overland from Missouri to Oregon, taking with them their wives and their children, their flocks and their herds, carrying their rifles on their shoulders and their spades in the great canvas-top wagons. In the following year 2,000 Americans crossed the trail from Missouri to Oregon. It became urgent that the American Government secure a good title and definite boundaries to the possessions of this country in Oregon. The issue was crystallized by the Democrats in the campaign of 1844 by the cry of "54 40 or fight." Apparently the Democrats have never been adverse to expansion when the territory was available for settlement of white men and could be incorporated into the Union. This corrects the historical falsehood that the Democrats as a political party were in favor of acquiring territory only for the purpose of the extension of slavery. On this issue Polk defeated the brilliant Henry Clay. All the country could see that upon the result of the election depended not only the fate of Oregon, but the fate of the new republic of Texas, which was then knocking for admission. [Applause.] Missouri followed Polk even against her dazzling idol Henry Clay. The march of events was rapid now. In 1845 Texas was admitted to the Union. In 1846 Polk asked Thomas H. Benton to father the Oregon treaty in the Senate. The result was that the title to Oregon was established and the compromise boundary fixed where it now exists. This same year marked the opening of the War with Mexico.

At this time Frémont made his third expedition to California. This was the first exploration he had made under Government authority. The earlier ones are said to have been made at private expense—his own and that of patriotic citizens of St. Louis. He owed his governmental authority to the unceasing work of his father-in-law, Senator Benton, against the combined opposition in political life in Washington, not only of Benton's enemies and Frémont's enemies, but the enemies of the settlement of the West.

It is said that Benton had a tremendous fight to get Frémont started on that expedition. Such men as Daniel Webster brought the whole force of their tremendous intellectual artillery against the exploration of California and the West. They denounced it as foolhardy and dangerous, as calculated to break up the Union, as trying to lead away the settlers of the older States, as reducing the value of agricultural land east of the Mississippi, and every possible ground.

I think that it was on this occasion that, after Frémont had made his plans and assembled his party and was on the point of leaving St. Louis, his enemies in Washington, by a temporary triumph, succeeded in having his recall issued. The recall was sent to St. Louis and fell into the hands of his heroic wife. Mrs. Frémont, with the wholly illogical, but sublime, heroism of such women, promptly decided not to communicate the recall to her husband and thus ruin the plans and blast the dreams of which she had been such an earnest sharer. She allowed her husband to go on his way with his little band, technically a traitor, in flat disobedience to his Government. He reached California in January, 1846, before the outbreak of hostilities with Mexico, but the war was at this time plainly impending. The Spanish governor ordered him to leave without delay. Instead of complying with this order, he and his little band of 60 men hoisted the flag of the United States on the soil of California March 9, 1846, where it has ever since remained. [Applause.]

War with Mexico was declared April 13, 1846. Immediately Gen. Kearny, a Missourian and an officer in the United States Army, in command at Fort Leavenworth, was given authority to raise two mounted regiments for service in Mexico. The first regiment to respond was the celebrated First Missouri Cavalry of Col. Alexander W. Doniphan, a regiment that contained more heroic men, more famous names, among its roll of privates and subaltern officers than any other similar organization known in American history.

With this regiment, gathered wholly from the western part of Missouri, and a small force of Regulars, Gen. Kearny began his march, without supplies, without reserve forces, and without lines of communication, overland down the Santa Fe Trail into the heart of the enemy's country. The 900 miles were covered by the middle of August. On August 22 Gen. Kearny formally took possession, in the name of the United States, of all of New Mexico, then including Arizona, and established a civil government in the name and under the authority of the United States. In this instance also it is probable that a Missourian exceeded his legal authority, for no territory had been acquired or demanded from Mexico except the right to the peaceful annexation of Texas. In the midst of international war, civil strife, and savage depredations this little band of Missourians erected and consecrated the sacred temple of the law. Gen. Kearny, a Missourian, promulgated the first constitution, or bill of rights, of New Mexico and with it a code of laws drafted by Col. Doniphan and a brilliant young Missouri lawyer in his regiment, Willard P. Hall. A Missourian, Charles Dent, was appointed the first civil governor; another Missourian, of budding greatness, Francis P. Blair, was made attorney general. This was the first acquisition of foreign soil as the result of the War with Mexico. It is said to have been technically unauthorized, but the flag there planted never came down, and the laws there promulgated have never ceased to exist.

The subsequent history of this expedition is well known. Gen. Kearny, with a small force, started overland for California. Col. Doniphan, with his 1,000 Missourians, marched into the heart of old Mexico. Before he left Santa Fe Col. Sterling Price had arrived with the second regiment of Missourians and held possession of the Territory, maintaining peace and order until it was formally ceded to the United States. There is a curious side light upon American ideals of government in this early settlement of New Mexico. The Navajo Indians had for many years been carrying on a destructive and savage warfare against the Mexicans. Col. Sterling Price was appealed to to protect the citizens of New Mexico against the Indians. He promptly sent a small force under Capt. John W. Reid, afterwards a Member of Congress from my district, who pursued the Indians to their mountain fastness and subdued them in a pitched battle.

The astonishment of the Indians was great. When their chief submitted to Capt. Reid he told him, through an interpreter—

We do not understand why you Americans fight with us. You come here to fight the Mexicans and you are fighting them. We also are fighting the Mexicans, and why did you not let us fight them as much as you do? Why have you pursued us here into our villages?

Reid's answer was short, sharp, and thoroughly American. He said:

The Mexicans were our enemies, but they have been subdued and have submitted to us. We feel obliged to protect their lives and their property from any danger whatsoever, and we can not let you continue your war.

The close of the war in 1848 brought under the American flag the magnificent domain of California, comprising all of four States and parts of three others. Thus in three years from the foundation laid by Missouri exploration and enterprise three great empires, Texas, Oregon, and California came under the Stars and Stripes.

In 1849 gold was discovered in California, and the rush of settlers to the Pacific coast began. The West presented a busy scene in those days. The Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers were teeming with boats. The river towns along the Missouri, and especially those close to the great bend at the western border of the State were crowded with teams, mule, horse, and oxen, and the huge and picturesque canvas-covered schooners that were used in freighting across the plains. A ceaseless army of Americans made this hazardous trip across the plains, through the mountain passes, and over the deserts to the golden land of California. Western Missouri was the last inhabited and settled portion of the country that they saw. Here they must gather their supplies and bid farewell to all hope of civilization and safety, unless they could win in the unequal battle against the forces of nature, wild and savage, both inanimate and animate. It is needless to say that Missourians led this mass of emigrants and gave color and character to the whole. Joe Bowers and his brother Ike have become immortal types of this great exodus. For more than half a century, down to the present time, the prevailing name on the Pacific coast for all newcomers from the Central West is Pike or Pike County. They seem to assume that those who travel across the plains are "All the way from Pike."

The land-title abstract books in the western part of the State of Missouri show in the numerous families of those days there were always some of the sons, Johns, Williams, Henrys, and Stephens, and so forth, who were reported as missing, supposed to have died, single and unmarried, in California. Their record is written all through the land titles of Missouri, and their bones are supposed to be whitening on the way across the great desert.

Some gentlemen seem to be afraid of the recall of public officers. The recall in some form has been exercised by the people and always will be exercised by the people. [Applause.] The permanent political power can reside nowhere but in the people, and if they make mistakes, it may be said that the power to make mistakes and to suffer by them is of the very essence of self-government. The greatest man who ever represented Missouri in either branch of Congress was practically recalled. Thomas H. Benton closed his career by a recall. In 1849 the legislature passed the Jackson resolution, instructing Benton how to vote on the question of unionism and slavery. Benton refused, and went home to submit his case to the people. He went from one end of that State to the other, in the midst of that gathering storm of political strife, championing the cause in which he believed. He went down to defeat, but does any man say that such defeat left a stain on Benton? Can any man say that a representative of the people who does what he believes is right and sticks to it can be stained on the pages of history by subsequent events? Why, there is no more stain on the fame of Benton because he went down to defeat than there is on that of Robert E. Lee because he went down to defeat.

It is in the man, in his belief in the cause for which he fights. The tremendous political storm which accompanied Benton's recall I can liken to nothing so much as an incident that occurred about 20 years ago in the harbor of Samoa.

A phenomenal hurricane occurred in that part of the Pacific, which swept all of the small craft away and carried them out to destruction. In the harbor of Apia lay 7 war vessels, as I recollect—1 English, 3 German, and 3 American. Even the great warships, sheltered as they were in the harbor, were not able to withstand the storm. All of these war vessels were wrecked except two; the British steamer and one German vessel escaped. There was one war vessel, I have forgotten whether German or American, but I think German, which made an heroic fight against fate. Its commander had every available man, naked to the waist, shoveling in the coal and keeping the furnaces at white heat, getting up every pound of steam that the great old ship could muster, and she was headed out into the teeth of the storm. She had her anchor sunk in the mud of the bay, but the storm increased in fury, and in spite of every effort it was seen that she was dragging her anchor and was certainly going down to destruction. All the other vessels were straining every nerve to save themselves; they had neither time nor power to help. When the commander of this noble ship saw that she was doomed, that every human effort had failed, he ran his colors up to the top of his mast, he called every jackie on deck and had them man the yardarms, he brought up his marine band and stationed it on the forecastle, and then they struck up the national air. As they drifted back past the remaining vessels there blared out above the roar of the storm the notes of the national air. Every man within sight knew the ship was going down to certain destruction. The English and the American sailors rushed to the sides of their vessels, and above the shrieking and howling of the tempest was heard cheer after cheer of honest, courageous, human hearts hailing those who could face the inevitable and face it like men. [Applause.]

When old Benton saw that the maelstrom of American political strife had carried away the small vessels, was sweeping away the little men, the time servers, the trimmers, the pickers, and stealers that get into politics, and that it was a fight to the death with titanic forces, he put on every pound of steam possible, be bared his brow to the storm and worked like a hero to save himself. But when he found he could not resist the tide of public opinion, he nailed his colors to the mast and went down to defeat with band playing and his flag still flying. I would not say that only a man big enough to do that is big enough to go to the United States Senate, but I say that a man that can do that is big enough to be a Senator from Missouri.

During the decade that followed, Missouri continued her efforts in colonizing, settling, and developing the great empires which had so suddenly been brought under the protection of the American flag. It was a wild region, inhabited only by roving savages. It is not strange that for many years the older communities of the East refused to believe seriously that the vast stretches of the trans-Mississippi country could be made the home of the white man. The conviction was very general in the East that not within any reasonable period of human life could the great, barren West be reclaimed. This conviction was not without reasonable foundation, but those who held to this belief failed to take into account the abiding faith of the people of the Missouri Valley in their own tremendous powers of colonization. Missouri had been an empire builder from the beginning of her history. She had been working miracles of exploration and settlement from the very dawn of the century. After 50 years of dazzling success she could not lose faith in her own power. In 1850 the building of the Missouri Pacific Railroad was begun at St. Louis. During the next eight years the St. Louis & San Francisco, the Iron Mountain, the North Missouri, and the Hannibal & St. Joe stretched their tiny arms westward from the Mississippi River. This was at the cost to the State of Missouri of $24,000,000, being the first and only expense of this kind which the people of Missouri, as a whole, ever authorized.

When Kansas was thrown open for settlement in 1856, Missouri met her first defeat as a colonizing power. She undertook to colonize and settle Kansas, but without success. The singular result has been that from that day to this Missouri has continued to draw more from Kansas than from any other State in the Union. Very few Missourians go to Kansas, but thousands of Kansans go to Missouri every year.

Mr. MANN. That is what Missouri depends upon.

Mr. BORLAND. To a great extent. She gets the best blood and brains of Kansas, and they are good, too. Every good Kansan, when he gets rich, promptly moves to Missouri to enlarge the horizon of his business opportunity.

The people of Missouri have always cherished a profound belief in the inherent right of every State to govern itself and regulate its own institutions. On the issue of "squatter sovereignty" Missouri was the only State, except New Jersey, to give its electoral vote to Stephen A. Douglas in the presidential election of 1860. Although a slaveholding State, her attachment to the Union was strong. When the dark clouds of the Civil War gathered over our devoted country, the storm broke with pitiless fury upon the State of Missouri. A man in the extreme North or one in the extreme South had little difficulty in choosing his political ground. He was carried along in the rush of the political opinion of his section. It cost something, however, to have political opinions in Missouri, and thousands of lives and millions of property were engulfed in the frightful maelstrom of civil strife. Her military strength was taxed as was that of no other State. Between 1861 and 1865 Missouri furnished 109,000 men to the Union Army and 50,000 to the Confederate Army. The startling nature of these figures is apparent when we understand that she sent 47 per cent of all men of military age into the Union Army and 23 per cent of all men of military age into the Confederate Army. More than 70 per cent of her fighting men were in the two armies. It is possible that large numbers entered the armies of the South of whom no record can be obtained. The ravages of the Civil War left deep scars on the fair breast of Missouri. Many years have passed since then, and each recurring springtide has spread its mantle of green over the wounds; summer has touched them with the gold of her harvest; autumn for a brief space revives the crimson glory until old winter brings the white flag of truce and spreads the snowy couch for the birth of a newer, better year. [Applause.]

Most historians for some reason or other stop at the close of the Civil War. I do not know why this should be, unless that titanic struggle so stunned the muse of history that she is unable to resume the commonplace of peaceful progress. The highest ambition of the human soul is not realized in the destruction of life and property, even in a noble cause. Greater is he who can create, develop, and build up; he who can make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before. 'Tis as the poet has said about the destruction of the sacred oak:

> Thou can'st not censure more than we
> The vandal hand that laid thee low,
> For any fool can fell a tree,
> But it takes a god to make one grow.

[Applause.]

In the half century that has followed the civil strife Missouri has not only healed her own wounds, but has sent forth her sons in ceaseless stream to all the Commonwealths of the western land. On the sun-baked plains and on the bleak mountains, where permanent human habitation was considered impossible, the divine alchemy of science has transmuted all the baser elements of stubborn nature into the gold of human progress. The desert has been taught to blossom like the rose, and the mountain fortresses have been carried by assault until they have received their invaders within their own bosoms and furnished them homes in fruitful valleys. Missouri's fair daughter, Oklahoma, came into the Union only four years ago, and now has a greater population and more electoral votes than half the New England States. Northern Texas, Colorado, Wyoming, and Montana are being cultivated and developed by colonies of Missourians. Missouri has given freely of her sons, and especially of her tillers of the soil.

And what of the future? Is her work closed with the admission to the Union of the last of her family, or is it just begun? She can turn now to her own development and gather up some of the scattered wealth that has been disregarded in the hurried march of progress. A scientific writer has stated that Missouri is one of the richest and, economically, the most nearly independent of any district in the known world.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Excepting Oklahoma.

Mr. BORLAND. Not excepting Oklahoma.

The extent and variety of resources in Missouri are remarkable. It is said that if a hostile army were to surround entirely the State and besiege it with the design of starving it into submission Missouri could subsist upon her own resources without aid from the outside world and maintain the highest degree of civilization known to man. Not only so, but the Missourians would have an enormous surplus of products to throw over the borders to their besieging foes. In the last decade, while the cities of Missouri have grown enormously, she has suffered a loss in her agricultural population. In spite of this, however, the increase in the value of her farm lands has been 102 per cent. Her mineral wealth can scarcely be estimated. One-third of her surface is underlain with inexhaustible deposits of coal. She contains the greatest zinc mines in the world, and is an enormous producer of lead. She is the first in the production of nickel and an important factor in the production of copper, silver, iron, barytes, and cement. Her climate and soil seem to have been wonderfully adapted to the growth of the best grades of hardwood lumber, especially white oak and the beautiful black walnut that is now becoming so rare. The fruit-culture possibilities of the Ozark Mountains have well repaid the scientific study which is being devoted to this pursuit. Southern Missouri has long been known as the land of the big red apple, and now she is known as the land of the big red strawberry. The crop of strawberries and other small fruit has become an enormous commercial asset. There are thousands of acres of lowlands in the southeast corner of the State, near the Mississippi River, that are being drained and cultivated. The richness of these reclaimed lands and their adaptation to the culture of cotton are rapidly increasing the wealth of that section of the State. The conservation of natural resources in Missouri has just begun. In the past only the land easiest of cultivation was occupied, but now science is unlocking many treasure houses of inexhaustible wealth. There is at least a half million acres of bottom land along the Missouri River and its tributaries which, when reclaimed, will prove to be of inexhaustible fertility. The gentle slopes of the Ozark Mountains are the abode of both beauty and health. The death rate of the State is low and the measure of human efficiency is high. Missouri is the poultry queen. The value of her poultry product is far in advance of any other State or district in the world.

In 1909 the faithful hen brought to the Missouri farmer $46,000,000. The Missouri hen could build the Panama Canal and pay the entire expense year by year without aid. She would be thoroughly willing to undertake this great public work at her own cost if it were not for the fact that the Missouri hog could dig the canal in three roots without stopping to grunt. It is unnecessary to eulogize our old friend, the Missouri mule, our country's best reliance in both peace and war. In 1909 the total natural products of Missouri, not including, of course, her wealth of manufactures, was worth the enormous sum of $530,000,000. Of this amount $342,000,000 were surplus products that were sent to market, the balance being consumed or manufactured within the State.

A short time ago the old capitol building of Missouri, at Jefferson City, which was constructed in 1837, was destroyed by fire. Missouri will erect a new capitol fully in keeping in size, value, and artistic beauty, with the greatness and wealth of the State. She can erect the most magnificent building in the world and furnish it complete with every convenience that modern science can suggest, or modern art can design, and all of it, down to the most minute detail, be the product of Missouri. Her own granite could lay the foundations; her building stone of beautiful shades could rear the lofty walls; her onyx and her marble could decorate the halls of legislation; her iron, lead, and zinc could furnish the metal work; her polished hard woods could luxuriously fit and furnish the offices and committee rooms; her native glass could add its crystal beauty; her cobalt and other minerals could paint the woodwork or emblazon upon glistening walls of Missouri plaster brilliant pictures of her romantic history, and in the sunlight above could shine the burnished dome of Missouri copper.

For a century emigration has flowed from and through Missouri to fill the apparently insatiable demands of the West. Uncle Sam had a boundless extent of free land which tempted the age-long land hunger of the white race. To-day those free lands are gone. Uncle Sam has no more farms to give away, except where the expense of irrigation must proceed cultivation. The tide of white civilization has rolled westward, and ever westward, until at length it dashed itself against the shores of Far Cathay. It can go no farther, but must plant its standard forever in the greatest natural home of white civilization—the Mississippi Valley.

Every man has his pet insanity, and I have mine. It is a profound and unshakeable belief in the greatness of the Middle West. Nowhere in the known world is there such a vast expanse of fertile region under one government, except in Russia, and Russia is a hundred years behind us in development. The Mississippi Valley contains a wealth of natural resources surpassing in sober fact the far-famed riches of the Valley of the Nile. Missouri has a luxuriance of vegetation that would make the vine-clad hills of Italy look like an arid desert. She has a variety of crops that would put to shame the fairest fields of fertile France. She has the forests and the mines, the cattle upon a thousand hills, and the mighty cities, where the smoke from countless factories rolls up like incense upon the altar of industry. With it all, she has a restless and indomitable race peopling this vast empire; a race that has planted civilization in the wilderness; that has snatched victory from the jaws of defeat; that has conquered the savage, harnessed nature, and laughs at time, distance, and difficulties. [Applause.]

With such an empire, and with such a race, what may she not hope? To her agricultural strength we will add commercial supremacy and financial independence. We will adorn her with learning, from the humble district school to the lordly university. We will crown her with art, and music, and letters, and political science, and philanthropy, and all that beautifies, sweetens, and ennobles human life. And high above the old Commonwealth we want to see wave once more the banner of Jeffersonian democracy, emblazoned with the people's motto: "Equal and exact justice to all, and special privileges to none." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. ANDREWS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. ANDREWS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, on June 20, 1910, there was passed by the Congress of the United States the enabling act, which was an act to enable the people of New Mexico and Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, the provisions being that the governor of said Territory shall within 30 days after the approval of the enabling act by proclamation, in which the aforesaid apportionment of delegates to the convention shall be fully specified and announced, order an election of the delegates aforesaid on a day designated by him in said proclamation, not earlier than 60 nor later than 90 days after the approval of this act. The election of delegates to this said constitutional convention for the Territory of New Mexico was held on the 6th day of September, 1910, and the constitutional convention was held in the capitol building at Santa Fe, N. Mex., on the 3d day of October, 1910, and adjourned on the 21st day of November, 1910.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this constitutional convention consisted of 71 Republicans and 29 Democrats. About 5 of the Democratic members of this said costitutional convention were sent to the said convention by Republican counties; that is to say, the Republicans placed them there by placing their names on tickets and elected them along with the Republicans. Out of the 100 members of the constitutional convention, Mr. Chairman, 71 were Republicans and 29 were Democrats, as stated above, and after the constitution of New Mexico was completed, the same was signed by all the Republican members and by 23 Democrats, 6 refusing to sign.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as stated above, this constitutional convention adjourned on the 21st day of November, 1910, and under the terms of the enabling act there were to be 60 days' lapse of time from the time of adjournment until the constitution could be voted upon for ratification or rejection by the duly qualified electors of the Territory of New Mexico, and during this lapse of time, Mr. Chairman, there was a spirited campaign carried on both for and against the ratification of the said constitution of New Mexico. Some few Democrats and Republicans, Mr. Chairman, were against the ratification of the constitution, but the greater majority of both the old parties—the Republican Party and the Democratic Party—were for the constitution and rode together, spoke on the same platform together, and worked together for the adoption of the said constitution of New Mexico, and all questions pertaining to it were thrashed over in public meetings by both parties; and on the 21st day of January, 1911, Mr. Chairman, an election was held in the Territory of New Mexico for the purpose of accepting or rejecting the constitution of New Mexico as framed by the constitutional convention at Santa Fe from October 3 to November 21, 1910, and after the result of the said election was announced it was found that there were about 31,742 votes cast for the constitution and about 13,399 against, leaving a majority of about 18,343 for the constitution. Now, Mr. Chairman, after this vote on the question of accepting or rejecting the constitution, and which said vote resulted in the acceptance of the said constitution by the people of New Mexico with a handsome majority, under the terms of the enabling act certified copies of the said constitution, with a statement of the votes cast thereon, were brought to Washington, copies of same being duly given to the President of the United States and to Congress for their approval or disapproval, as per section 4 of the enabling act, which I attach hereto, with request that it be made a part of these remarks:

SEC. 4. That when said constitution and such provisions thereof as have been separately submitted shall have been duly ratified by the people of New Mexico as aforesaid, a certified copy of the same shall be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon and upon any provisions thereof which were separately submitted to and voted upon by the people. And if Congress and the President approve said constitution and the said separate provisions thereof, or, if the President approves the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then and in that event the President shall certify said facts to the governor of New Mexico, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of said notification from the President of the United States, issue his proclamation for the election of the State and county officers, the members of the State legislature and Representatives in Congress, and all other officers provided for in said constitution, all as hereinafter provided; said election to take place not earlier than 60 days nor later than 90 days after said proclamation by the governor of New Mexico ordering the same.

Now, Mr. Chairman, copies of the certified constitution reached here on the 9th day of February, 1911, and the same was recommended for approval by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Attorney General of the United States, and on the 24th day of February, 1911, the constitution of New Mexico was approved of by the President of the United States in a message to Congress by him, a copy of which I attach hereto and request that it be made a part of these remarks:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, etc., passed June 20, 1910, provides that when the constitution, for the adoption of which provision is made in the act, shall have been duly ratified by the people of New Mexico in the manner provided in the statute, a certified copy of the same will be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, and that if Congress and the President approve of such constitution, or if the President approve the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then that the President shall certify said facts to the governor of New Mexico, who shall proceed to issue his proclamation for the election of State and county officers, etc.

The constitution prepared in accordance with the act of Congress has been duly ratified by the people of New Merico, and a certified copy of the same has been submitted to me and also to the Congress for approval, in conformity with the provisions of the act. Inasmuch as the enabling act requires affirmative action by the President, I transmit herewith a copy of the constitution, which, I am advised, has also been separately submitted to Congress, according to the provisions of the act, by the authorities of New Mexico, and to which I have given my formal approval.

I recommend the approval of the same by the Congress.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 24, 1911.

On February 17, 1911, Mr. Chairman, the House Committee on the Territories of the Sixty-first Congress began hearings on the proposed constitution of the State of New Mexico, of which several were held and opportunity was given to people both for and against the constitution to be heard, and on the 28th day of February, 1911, the resolution to approve the constitution of New Mexico was favorably reported to the House by the Committee on Territories, each and every member of that committee being in favor of the approval of the said constitution. The minority members of that committee numbered six and the ranking Democratic member, Mr. Chairman, was Mr. LLOYD, who is the chairman of the Democratic congressional committee of the United States, and, I might add, Mr. Chairman, one of the ablest Members on the opposite side of this Chamber, and I might further add, one of the fairest.

As I stated above, this constitution was reported favorably to the House, and I do not think that it was five minutes until the same was passed on the floor of this House unanimously, both the majority and minority forces of the House at that time being for it. The resolution calling for the approval of the New Mexico constitution, after being passed by the House, then went to the Senate on the 28th day of February, 1911. The resolution then went to the calendar, and at a later hour, Mr. Chairman, the Senator from Texas called the resolution up again and made an able, patriotic speech in favor of the approval of the constitution by the Senate, and, Mr. Chairman, I herewith quote his remarks to this House in full:

Mr. BAILEY said:

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will dispose of this matter without delay, and certainly it can be disposed of without being seriously delayed by what I intend to say. The only objection which I have heard urged to immediate action on the joint resolution is that it is desired to hold the State of New Mexico as a sort of hostage for the State of Arizona. I have given some little time and some little effort to secure the inestimable right of statehood for both of those Territories, and I recall that when an effort—a successful effort, too—was made to unite them into one State, in common with all of my political associates on this side, with one or two exceptions, and joined by a number of gentlemen on the other side, I resisted the union of those two Territories, and while we did not accomplish all we sought at that time, we did finally succeed in forcing into that enabling act a vote of each Territory to determine whether or not that union of them should be made. That proposition was negatived by the people of Arizona herself, and if she were not willing to be joined with New Mexico then, surely she will not ask New Mexico to wait for her now. The statehood of these two Territories is independent of each other. I remember, Mr. President, when we had those two statehood bills pending here, we also had a bill for the admission of the State of Oklahoma. When those two Territories were denied admission, I did not hear anybody contend that Oklahoma ought therefore to be made wait upon Arizona and New Mexico. The Congress of the United States has deliberately recorded its judgment that each of these Territories is suitable for admission into the Union as a State, and nowhere can it be found that any of us suggested that one should not be admitted until the other had adopted a constitution suitable to themselves or acceptable to us. I am, sir, moved now by no partisan consideration, because I know that unless something well-nigh like a miracle transpires, New Mexico will send two Republicans to this body; but, much as I think they will make a mistake in making such a choice, that does not disqualify them for statehood, and I am unwilling to deny to those people the right of local self-government upon such narrow and partisan consideration. There is, however, a question of party expediency, which my Democratic associates can afford to ignore. I feel constrained to say to my friends on this side that we might as well disorganize the Democratic Party of New Mexico as to stand in the way of statehood for that Territory. Senators who have lived in a Territory know that with their people statehood is always the paramount question.

If these people, having obeyed our command, having conformed to the enabling act which we passed almost without a dissenting voice when we reached the end of that controversy, having done all that we required of them, are now told that because some other people did not act as promptly as they did, or perhaps have not acted as wisely as they did, they shall be made to suffer this Territorial vassalage until somebody else shall have corrected an independent mistake, they will have ample cause to bitterly complain. I believe New Mexico is entitled to become a State. I believe New Mexico is qualified to become a State. I know that the faith of the American Congress has been pledged that she may become a State by conforming to the terms of that enabling act, and I sincerely hope that this Congress will signalize its closing hours by adding another star to the flag of the Union by making another Commonwealth, next to the last, I sincerely hope, that the Union will receive into the sisterhood. When we have taken New Mexico in upon terms of equality, and Arizona shall follow, as follow she will in time, then I am ready myself to adopt a constitutional amendment that no other State shall ever be admitted into the American Union. I hear those suggestions about Mexico on the south and I have heard suggestions about Canada to the north. There was a time when I would have believed the principle of the American Government susceptible of indefinite application. If you had adhered to the old-time doctrine of local self-government I think we might have covered a continent from ocean to ocean and from north to south. But, sir, when we abandoned that and were tempted by appropriations from the Federal Treasury to yield one State power and one State function after another, we made it dangerous to extend our jurisdiction, because it is as true in politics as it is in physics that when you increase the area over which a given force must operate, you must increase that force at its center; and as we extend the limits of this Republic it will be inevitable, sir, that we must extend the power of the Federal Government until it destroys the sovereignty of the States. Believing that and compelled to believe it by the trend of events, I want to close the book. I could not be tempted by anything they might offer us at the north, neither could I be tempted by anything that they might offer us on the south. It is for that reason that I am always eager to keep peace with our neighbors to the south. Our children will not be as well and as strongly fortified against the lust of our territorial expansion as our fathers were. We ran the flag of this Republic up once over the capital of a neighboring nation, and then gave the world an enduring exhibition of generosity to a foe by taking it down and bringing it home. But, sir, I fear very much that the same spirit of conquest, which sought to free the Philippines from an alien domination and ended by subjecting them to our own domination, will not be strong enough, nor wise enough, nor just enough to ever take the American flag down from the capital of another conquered nation. If I had my way I would take a bond against the spirit of conquest against this greed of territory by writing it into the Constitution of this Union that its circle had been completed and never again should its numbers be increased, but whether we shall do that or not must be decided in the years to come. It is enough for us to-night, sir, to perform the duty that lies before us and add a new star to the flag that shall answer to the name of another great and splendid Commonwealth.

But regardless of that fact, Mr. Chairman, the resolution failed of passage in the Sixty-first Congress, and so it is now up before you, gentlemen, in this special session of Congress, called by the President of the United States on the 4th day of April, 1911; and upon the matters to be acted upon in this special session, as agreed upon in your caucus at the opening of this special session of Congress, was, Mr. Chairman, the question of statehood for New Mexico and Arizona. On April 4, 1911, the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, the gentleman from Virginia, introduced a joint resolution in this House to approve the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona, which is known as House joint resolution 14, which is exactly the same as my joint resolution, 295, of the third session of the Sixty-first Congress, with the exception that it called for the approval of the Arizona constitution jointly with that of New Mexico, and with the exception of that it is the same as mine without the cross of a "t" or the dot of an "i." It was evident to my mind, Mr. Chairman, that it was the intent of the majority of this House to pass the said joint resolution 14 without any changes whatsoever being made. But, Mr. Chairman, at the first or second meeting of your Committee on the Territories there appeared four gentlemen from the Territory of New Mexico, who said that they desired to have the constitution of New Mexico made more easy of amendment, and after several hearings, extending over several weeks, these gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, have succeeded in making the majority side of your honorable Committee on the Territories believe that their views were in accordance with those of the people of New Mexico irrespective of party, and, Mr. Chairman, judging from letters, telegrams, and from the public press of the Territory of New Mexico, I am constrained to believe that these gentlemen represent no one but themselves, as the greater majority of the people of the Territory of New Mexico, irrespective of party, are against any amendments being made to the constitution; and, in closing, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I believe that this constitution of New Mexico will rank with any of the constitutions of the great States of this Union, and it has so been pronounced by very able lawyers, both on this floor and elsewhere, and I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that this constitution is more easy of amendment as it stands now than that of any State in this Union, with the exception of two or three, and now, gentlemen, as this constitution was passed by a majority of over 18,000, I sincerely trust that this joint resolution which has been presented to you by the majority of your Committee on the Territories will be voted down and the minority views prevail. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

[Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, my inclination is to apologize when I consume with my remarks the time of the House or the Committee of the Whole House; but there are several reasons why it is appropriate that I should discuss this resolution now pending, which provides for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union. New Mexico is my neighbor. My congressional district, beginning at the very center of our State and including its chief city and commercial metropolis, Oklahoma City, with a population of 75,000, extends northwestward more than 300 miles to the eastern border of New Mexico. Oklahoma has contributed its share in the growth of the population of these two Territories. Many of our good citizens during the last four years have emigrated to these two Territories. I know many of these people personally. These Oklahomans who have sought homes in New Mexico and Arizona are good citizens and will do their part in the founding, the building, and the perfecting of the institutions of the two new States about to be created. These two Territories are situate in the great Southwest, a section of the country of which Oklahoma is a part. Naturally our people are deeply interested in bringing into the Union two additional States from the great Southwest, a section of the Union that will, in the near future, rapidly increase in wealth, in population, and in its influence in the affairs of our Nation.

More than this, it has been less than four years since the people of my State emerged from the thraldom of Territorial government. The undesirable conditions, the material disadvantages, the political restrictions, the burdens, drawbacks, and handicaps of Territorial government are still fresh in their minds. I feel, therefore, that I am voicing the unanimous sentiment of the people of Oklahoma when I urge the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as sovereign States into the Union at the earliest date possible.

GOVERNMENT WITHOUT CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Chairman, I do not agree in all things with many of the able gentlemen who have discussed this resolution. To my mind there is a disposition to place too much importance upon the various provisions that are found in these proposed constitutions. I have had a somewhat varied personal experience in testing the value of a constitution to a people.

On the 22d day of April, 1889, with the great rush into Oklahoma, I established my residence in that Territory. From that day until May, 1890, there were 60,000 to 75,000 people in that Territory without a constitution. Aye, more than that, we were without laws. We were without any government. Congress had provided that these lands, aggregating something like 2,000,000 acres, should be opened under the proclamation of the President; but Congress, through inadvertence or for some other reason, failed to provide any laws for the people. No provision was made for State, Territorial, county, or municipal governments. Seventy-five thousand people lived there for more than a year without a constitution and without any State laws; in fact, with no laws at all, except a few Federal statutes which applied where the United States had exclusive jurisdiction. But what did those people do? They gave the world a sublime object lesson of what American citizens can do without a constitution and without laws.

In this emergency our people maintained order, preserved the peace, established schools, built churches, founded cities, engaged in trade and commerce, engaged in every line of business and in every occupation, and gave adequate protection to life and property. During this year the people were happy and contented, and without a constitution, without any legal local government, had their full share of that liberty and justice which is enjoyed by every American community.

I well remember that opening day. As men settled upon lands or upon town lots one of the most common things to observe was to see them carrying in their hands American flags. When they located upon these lands or upon the town lots the first thing they did, the first act of settlement performed, the first monument of ownership erected on the claim or town lot was an American flag. And as these settlers, coming from the various States of this Union, carried in their hands the Stars and Stripes, so they carried in their hearts the constitutions and the laws of the State from which they came; and there the principles of justice, self-government, and Christian civilization embodied and exemplified in these laws and constitutions were transplanted into the fruitful soil of the new State and have guided our people in their aspirations for the attainment of the highest and best in human government.

I remember that on the afternoon of April 22, 1889, on the town site of Guthrie, where I located, there were 20,000 people. I vividly recall how the people instituted their first government. Ten thousand men gathered on a beautiful hillside for the purpose of holding the first election in the new State. What was the method adopted? It was the very method that this House of Representatives uses when we take a vote by tellers. Tellers were appointed, and those 10,000 intelligent, patriotic citizens, gathered from all the States of this Union, passed between the tellers and expressed their choice between the candidates for mayor. What occurred at Guthrie took place at Oklahoma City and at other places. All this demonstrates to my mind that it is not so much the Constitution and the laws that make good government, but that good government comes from what the people have in their hearts and in their consciences.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT.

Then Congress gave us a Territorial government, and from May, 1890, up until the 16th day of November, 1907, over 17 years, we were under a Territorial form of government, without a constitution. And what magnificent progress our people made there without a constitution. When we came into the Union we had a population of 1,400,000 people. We had accumulated vast millions of property. We had established a system of public schools that was scarcely surpassed in any State of this Union. We had founded higher educational institutions, erected churches, and established social, educational, charitable, and industrial institutions, comparing favorably with the best, in the highest civilization of the world.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that when you had a constitution, that you and other gentlemen who think as you do voted against it, and that you wanted to continue in the condition you were in without statehood?

Mr. MORGAN. I will come to that very soon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not that a fact?

Mr. MORGAN. I voted against it myself, and, according to the report, about 90,000 others, all very intelligent and patriotic men, did as I did. [Applause.]

Now, then, I want to talk a little about our constitution. I feel it is proper that I should do so, because the storm center of this discussion is around the initiative, referendum, and recall, and we have in our constitution the initiative and referendum.

Mr. TRIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the Government of the United States undertake to exclude you from the Union of States because you do have the initiative and referendum in your constitution?

Mr. MORGAN. We are in the Union now, and I do not know of any effort to exclude us.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Has there been any effort to exclude you?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Then why do you and others want to exclude this Territory?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not said I was in favor of excluding it. The constitutional convention which prepared our constitution was overwhelmingly Democratic.

The constitution was prepared and promulgated. The people voted on it. About 80,000 votes were cast against that constitution. In further answer to the question propounded to me by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], I will state that I voted against the main part of that constitution. I voted for some of the special provisions upon which the people were allowed a separate vote.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Did the gentleman vote against the initiative and referendum part of it?

Mr. MORGAN. I had my own peculiar reasons why I voted against that constitution. I did not vote against it because it contained the initiative and referendum or because it created a corporation commission with the most sweeping powers over the corporations of our State. The main reason that I voted against the constitution was because I thought the constitutional convention, in apportioning the members of the legislature to the various counties, had committed a political crime against the people of Oklahoma. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WITHERSPOON in the chair). Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman refers to the gerrymander in Oklahoma. Did the Democrats in Oklahoma count one county three times in making up their list of senators and representatives, as they did in New Mexico?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not examined the matter to which the gentleman refers. I will tell you what our constitutional convention did. I am sorry I am driven into this, because I did not want to discuss matters relating to political controversies in my own State. I prefer to fight these matters out at home. But here is the method used by our Democratic constitutional convention to insure a Democratic legislature: Draw a line through Oklahoma, running from the east to the west, about the center of the State. Generally the counties south of this line are largely Democratic, while the counties north of the line are slightly Republican. In the upper branch of our legislature, according to our population at that time, on an average about 30,000 people were entitled to one senator.

Near the Texas line, north of the line above referred to, were the adjoining counties of Ellis and Dewey; Republican counties, with a combined population exceeding 30,000. Placed in a senatorial district these two counties ordinarily would have elected a Republican State senator. South of the line were the counties of Roger Mills and Beckham, largely Democratic, with a combined population of about 30,000, entitling them to a senator. Under the apportionment in our constitution these four counties were placed in a senatorial district and given two senators. The double district thus created was largely Democratic. Another instance, Caddo County is a large county, with over 30,000 population, entitled to a senator. Caddo County, though close politically, was regarded as a Republican county. South of Caddo was Grady County—a county with a large Democratic majority—with a population sufficient to entitle it to one senator. These two counties were placed in one senatorial district and given two senators. Still another instance, Lincoln County, a Republican county, and Pottawatomie County, largely Democratic, each entitled to a senator, were placed in one district and given two senators. This method was followed along this line from Texas to Arkansas, and illustrates the kind of political theft that was perpetrated upon the people. [Applause on the Republican side.] The honorable gentlemen, our Democratic politicians, dominating our constitutional convention, were posing as reformers. They assumed political virtues not possessed by the ordinary citizen. They claimed to be the champions of the people's rights. They denounced corporations for robbing the people. But I could not see any difference in principle between corporations robbing the people of their money and politicians robbing people of their just and fair representation in the legislative assembly.

Now, I say I did not intend to bring these things out in this debate. However much I may criticize the acts of our Democratic politicians at home, when I talk in the House of Representatives of the United States I much prefer to speak well of all Oklahomans, for nothing is more sacred to me than the honor, reputation, and good name of Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I can not yield to the gentleman just now. I know it is said that all political parties have been guilty of such things to a greater or less extent. Even if this be true, such things could not control me. I must be guided by my own conscience. I regarded the apportionment as unfair and unjustifiable. I deemed it a species of political robbery, and so far as I was concerned, I did not propose to give it my indorsement, and I have never been ashamed to face the people of Oklahoma upon that question. But, Mr. Chairman, what did our own Democratic politicians finally do? They were so ashamed of that apportionment that they placed in the constitution a provision that, after the census of 1910, such an outrage, such a political crime, could never again be perpetrated upon the people. I cheerfully give them credit for this.

But they took no chances in seeing that for six year at least Oklahoma should be represented in the United States Senate by Democratic Senators, and that in the meantime the legislation, institutions, and affairs of the State should be in the complete control of the Democrats.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. With reference to New Mexico, is the gentleman aware that that constitution prohibits the redistricting of that State, as the presiding officer of that convention said, for 99 years, and is not that the main reason for the objection of the Democrats against the New Mexico constitution?

Mr. ANDREWS. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Texas is entirely wrong about the apportionment of New Mexico. The New Mexico apportionment is as fair as in any

State in this Union, although it has been proclaimed from the other side that it was not. The trouble is that they could not put in a provision that a Republican county should elect Democratic members.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was not the point I made.

Mr. ANDREWS. The point you are raising is that they can not make a reapportionment for 10 years. That is so in all the States—until the next census.

Mr. MORGAN. For myself, I am in favor of admitting New Mexico immediately upon this constitution adopted by the people. I am opposed to that part of the resolution now pending which requires the people of New Mexico to vote upon certain proposed amendments. I regard this as unfair and wholly without justification.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. For a minute.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The objection I made was to the fact that the constitution could not be changed. The way it is made, it is almost impossible to submit to the people a constitutional amendment that will change the basis that you now have.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is all rot; it is mere assertion.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said frankly why I voted against the constitution of Oklahoma when it was submitted to the vote of the people.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MORGAN. For a question.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has made a statement with reference to the districting of the State by the Democrats. I do not desire to occupy his time or to divert his attention, but the thought is this: That the President of the United States—President Roosevelt—sent special census takers down there to take the census to determine whether or not, in truth and in fact, we had gerrymandered the State. It resulted that the gerrymander which Congress gave the State was a thousand times more vicious than any single gerrymander found in the State.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not concede that at all. This controversy has been pushed upon me. I want to say this, however, that I believe the bulk of the Republicans voted against the constitution, which was a Democratic document. It contained many things that were objectionable to many people. The bulk of the Republicans voted against it, but when the voice of the people had been heard and the majority indorsed the constitution, the Republicans and Socialists said: "We will unite with the Democratic forces; we will work out our destiny and build up a great State, in spite of some bad things in the constitution."

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Has not the voice of the people been heard in New Mexico and Arizona again?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; so far as I know. As to the initiative and referendum in the Oklahoma constitution, I will say that I believe that a great majority of the people—Republicans, Socialists, and Democrats alike—want to give the initiative and referendum a fair trial. That is now our situation. I believe our people are favorably disposed to both of these provisions. I have heard little complaint about them. I can say that at one time the minority, the Republican Party in my State, used the referendum with great advantage to the people.

I refer to this not for the purpose of criticizing our Democratic politicians down there; but at one time our legislature passed what the Republicans regarded as a very partisan and a very unfair and very dangerous election law. The Republicans took advantage of the referendum provision which had been given us by the Democratic constitutional convention, secured a proper petition, presented it to the secretary of state, and while there were technical objections made to it and we were compelled to go to the supreme court of the State, that court said that it was regular and ordered an election.

Then what? Our Democratic politicians, apparently being frightened, knowing that they could not go before the people and sustain that election law, promptly had a special session of the legislature called, and that objectionable election law was repealed. We took the instrument that they gave us, and in that instance I believe it worked to the advantage of the entire people, without regard to politics.

They passed another election law, not so objectionable, but still a partisan election law. Republicans, as well as many prominent Democrats, to-day are demanding that the people of Oklahoma shall have a nonpartisan election law. And to-day apparently the only prospect the people of Oklahoma have of securing a fair, impartial, nonpartisan election law is to obtain it through and by virtue of the initiative provision in our constitution.

My observation and experience is that the referendum and initiative may be valuable to a minority party, especially if the majority party is represented by a political machine and that machine happens not to be very conscientious about the methods it employs in order to perpetuate itself in power.

So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the initiative and referendum. I shall not vote against Arizona coming into the Union because these provisions are in her constitution. I do not understand that this question is a political question. I glanced through the Democratic platform of 1908 and the Republican platform of 1908, and as I understand it, neither of the great political parties have declared for or against these propositions.

Applied to political parties as we have them now, the initiative and referendum and the recall are neither Democratic nor Republican doctrines. There seems to be a wide difference of opinion upon both sides of the House as to the wisdom of these measures. Some very learned gentlemen here, whose judgment I greatly respect, say that in the recall of public officers there is great danger to our free institutions. I have tried to look at this thing fairly, and I confess that I do not so regard this provision. My judgment is that as the States constituting this Union shall go on in their history power in their Representatives will not be increased, but as years shall go by the people will more and more participate by direct vote in the affairs of the State. As our people naturally grow more intelligent, as they shall progress in their capacity of self-government, I believe the tendency of the future will be for an enlargement of the powers of the people to participate directly in the administration of affairs of state.

Of course nobody expects that by using the initiative and referendum the people can or will enact the great bulk of laws necessary for the government of the State. But nothing of that kind is expected. But when great questions are pending, when great, fundamental propositions are before the people, when perhaps the party in power shall be imposing upon the rights of the people, then the initiative and referendum will be a weapon and an instrument in the hands of the people whereby they can more speedily secure what is right and just and best for all.

As to the recall, I do not understand that that will in any way affect the form of government. My understanding is that many lawyers claim that the initiative and referendum does affect the form of the government, and that if a State has these provisions in its constitution it is not therefore republican in form—that is, not a representative government.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. Do I understand that any Member of the House has contended upon the floor of the House that because a constitution should have in it an initiative and referendum it is not therefore a republican form of government?

Mr. MORGAN. I will say this, that I know good lawyers who maintain that.

Mr. RAKER. But nobody on the floor of the House on either side.

Mr. MORGAN. I can not say positively. I know that when Oklahoma was admitted there were a good many persons who claimed that those provisions made our form of government not republican in form, and that was one of the objections urged against the admission of Oklahoma, but notwithstanding these objections Oklahoma was admitted.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is the recall more against the republican form of government than the referendum and the initiative?

Mr. MORGAN. I think not. I do not think the recall applies to the form of government. The question of the length of the term of public officers, or how they shall be elected or removed, I do not think applies to the form of government at all.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is not this an effort, then, to centralize the government, in undertaking to exclude a State that comes up and applies for admission with a republican form of government?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. If you undertake to exclude a Territory on account of its government, which is republican in form, would it not be centralizing to exclude such a State?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I would not exclude it. I am not trying to do that. I do not want to exclude either one of these States.

RECALL OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

I have not been able to see the dangers in the recall provision that others do. The public official is rightly regarded as the servant of the people. If his services are for any reason not satisfactory, the people have the right to remove him and select another. In my judgment, the right to recall public officials will tend to secure from them greater efficiency and a higher degree of faithfulness in the discharge of their duties. It will encourage strict attention to business, secure a more successful administration of public affairs, and will lessen the amount of malfeasance, dishonesty, graft, and fraud on the part of public officers.

Whoever asks his fellow citizens for a position which carries with it distinction, honor, and emoluments should accept the same recognizing the right of those who gave him the position to take from him the position. The vast majority of public officials in the United States, high and low, are of course honest, capable, and faithful officers.

But there are many exceptions. Too many men seek and secure public offices solely with the view of gratifying their own selfish ends. Prompted by greed and avarice, they seek and obtain public office and then proceed to betray the people and rob the taxpayers. In actual practice I do not believe the right of recall would be frequently exercised. But, in my opinion, the placing of this power in the hands of the people will, on the whole, insure better service from public officials, a more honest administration of public affairs, and a higher standard of honesty and integrity among public officials generally.

RECALL OF JUDGES.

As to the recall of judges, I do not agree with many very able and distinguished gentlemen who have declared this a most dangerous provision. In my opinion, the recall provision applied to judges will not destroy the independence of the judges or interfere with the administration of justice. With the recall provision in force you will see that judges will go on in the future, as they have in the past, doing their duty, maintaining the dignity of their high positions, administering justice, construing the law, interpreting the statutes, delivering opinions, rendering decisions, entering decrees and judgments, and through it all maintaining the confidence and respect of the people and receiving their support. The high regard which the people have for the courts does not depend upon the fact that the judges are not subject to recall. The fact is that in the various States of the Union, after judges have served a term of four or six years and their terms expire and the people have an opportunity to recall them or elect another person, they usually do not do so, but reelect the old judge, thus demonstrating that the people respect the judge who does his duty and reelect him again and again. The judiciary and our courts are creatures of the people. Their security rests not upon the fact that the people can not recall the judges, but upon the fact that our people have confidence in our courts, respect the judges, and believe they are not only able, but honest in their decisions. So long as our judges continue impartial, fair, honest, and sincere in discharging their high duties the people will sustain them; but it will be a sad day for our country should the time ever come when the people shall conclude that our courts are corrupt and our judges dishonest. The people have confidence in our judges as a rule, not because they can not recall them from office, but because judges as a rule have made records that entitle them to the confidence of the people. So it will be in the future, even with the recall in force. The able, honest, upright, conscientious judge will not have and need not have any fear of being recalled.

GOOD CITIZENSHIP MEANS GOOD GOVERNMENT.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion good government is not secured so much through constitutions and statutory laws as through good citizenship. Constitutional conventions may promulgate constitutions and legislatures may enact laws, but constitutional provisions and legislative acts are enforced and administered through the power of public opinion. The character of the people, the standard of citizenship is above the constitution and the laws. Good government is the result of good citizenship. In practical administration the government of any State is a reproduction of the ideals, conceptions, and principles of government in the hearts of the people. The initiative and referendum and the recall are not essential to the safety of the government or the perpetuity of our free institutions. The Republic will be preserved, our free institutions will be perpetuated, liberty and freedom will be maintained either with or without the initiative, referendum, and the recall. The splendid institutions that the people have erected on the American Continent are secure with or without these provisions in our State constitutions. Constitutions may be good or bad. All constitutions are imperfect. Every new provision proposed for the improvement of our government necessarily is more or less an experiment. How the initiative and referendum and the recall will work out in actual practice must necessarily be to some extent a matter of conjecture. But for one I am willing to try them. In voting to admit Territories as States into the Union I look to the character of the people rather than the special provisions in the constitution. I prefer to trust a good people with a bad constitution rather than a bad people with a good constitution. [Applause.] The true greatness of a State depends upon the character of the people. I really do not regard the initiative and referendum and the recall an issue in the vote for or against the admission of these Territories. Why should we vote to exclude Arizona from statehood because we find in her proposed constitution the initiative and referendum and the recall of all public officials, when Oregon, a State within the Union, has these same provisions in her constitution? I shall vote for the admission of both of these Territories, but in so doing will not feel that I am thereby voting for or against the initiative and referendum and the recall. I am not one who believes these provisions are essential to good government or necessary to protect the people in their liberties. But I see no great danger in these provisions, and I am perfectly willing to let them be tried.

If after trial they prove ineffectual, impractical, detrimental, or unwise, the people, in the exercise of good common sense, will discard these provisions and eliminate them from our constitutions and laws. For after all we must depend upon the people for good government. For the safety of our Republic, for the stability of our free institutions, for the preservation of our rights and liberties, for the wise administration of public affairs, we must look to the good sense, the intelligence, and the patriotism of the American people.

WELCOME TO THE PEOPLE OF ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

I hold in my hand a printed copy of the constitution of New Mexico. I read it through, article by article, and section by section. But I am not satisfied. I cast this constitution aside, and I take up the constitution of Arizona, and I read it through, article by article, section by section, clause by clause, phrase by phrase, and sentence by sentence. Still I hesitate. I ask for further evidence before I cast my vote on this resolution for the admission of these two Territories. And I turn from these inanimate, dead constitutions and look 2,000 miles to the southwest, beyond my own beloved State, to New Mexico and Arizona. I behold in each of these two Territories an intelligent people. They have demonstrated their ability to govern themselves. They have founded schools, erected churches, established charitable institutions, and have shown their fidelity to the Union and their loyalty to the flag. I am willing to trust these people. So I place these proposed constitutions in the background, and looking to the intelligent, loyal, and patriotic people of New Mexico and Arizona I say to them, "Welcome, thrice welcome, into this great Union—the United States of America." [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT in the chair). The Chair will state that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], who by unanimous-consent order of the House controls the time of the majority side of the House, was called from the Chamber, and he requested the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] for 30 minutes, and, without objection, the gentleman from Oklahoma will be recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this joint resolution provides for statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. I am in favor of their admission into the Union and full sisterhood of States, and in favor of it now.

I think before beginning a discussion of this almost entrancing subject it would be well to do as the lawyers do and file an agreed statement of facts that will govern all the way through this discussion. It is as follows:

First. That the only requirement of the Federal Constitution is that the constitutions of the incoming two States shall be republican in form.

Second. That they are republican in form and that they are not contrary to any provision of the enabling act or the Federal Constitution. Neither of the three reports attack them on either of these grounds.

Third. That the two proposed States have sufficient population, wealth, and area to entitle them to admission. No one, so far as I know, either in speech, brief, or by committee report, has attacked them on grounds other than technicalities.

Hence we have the right to assume that the agreed statement proposed is but a fair one.

With this agreed statement of facts as a premise to start with, my decided personal views are that this Congress and President Taft should not inflict on the people of Arizona and New Mexico the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" if those clerical acts be not agreeable to them. It is, however, but fair to state in this connection that if there ever was a pardonable exception to this rule it would be in the method of amendment of the New Mexico constitution, as per the majority report of the committee so far as it applies to New Mexico. For while I do not intend to deal with the New Mexico constitution in detail, or scarcely at all, I think it is safe to predict that numerous amendments to that document will soon become necessary and within the urgent desires of most of their citizenship. So while in my judgment, personally, I think it ill advised to inflict views upon a people that they do not want, this is perhaps the most pardonable.

As I read and as I understand Arizona's constitution I can not but conclude that it is the handiwork of men of the people, for every one of its pages fairly teem with the rights and liberties of the men that are to live under it. It is an embodiment of human liberties and human rights made by men who believe in humanity and scringe for their every ache and pain. [Applause.]

I am proud to welcome into this sisterhood of States a broad-gauged, broad-shouldered, courageous, warm-hearted citizenship who will, if this constitution is any criterion to go by, make us all better by reason of them. [Applause.]

I must not longer indulge in my affection and in eulogy for these new States soon to be, but must proceed to consider somewhat in detail Arizona's constitution, which safeguards well indeed the liberties of men. They have collected together the choicest provisions of all the constitutions of their sisters who have go on before.

For those who are deeply concerned over the transgressions of the rights of their fellow men I tell you, sir, few, if any, better constitutions were ever penned by the hand of man. [Applause.]

NO VICIOUS ELECTION LAWS.

Article 7, section 1, of the Arizona constitution provides:

All elections by the people shall be by ballot, or by such other method as may be prescribed by law, provided that secrecy in voting shall be preserved.

Here we observe no disposition, now or in the future, to throttle or bind down the State with vicious oppressive election laws. This insures forever the secrecy of the ballot—a universal essential in every election. This insures to those people a safe, sane, and honest election, free from boodle and free from graft. This is the first step to the political purity, progress, and honor of any State. I rejoice that they did not juggle, falter, or attempt to seek any semblance of unfairness, though it was within the power of that Democratic majority so to do.

POPULAR VOTE OF PEOPLE INSTRUCTING LEGISLATURE ON SENATORIAL ELECTIONS.

Article 7, section 9, of the Arizona constitution provides:

For the purpose of obtaining an advisory vote of the people the legislature shall provide for the placing of the names of the candidates for United States Senator on the official ballot at the general election next preceding the election of a United States Senator.

This step surely can meet with the criticism of but few, if any, on either side of this Chamber, and surely not from the Democratic side, who have for the last 20 years, in platform and in Congress, solemnly declared for the election of United States Senators by the popular vote. This is traveling, by those constitution makers, as far toward the light as their powers under the Federal Constitution will permit them to go. It is, I submit, in this regard merely following in the wake of this present Democratic House of Representatives, who at this very session have passed a joint resolution so to amend the Federal Constitution. It is but a following in the wake of 37 States who have passed resolutions petitioning Congress to take some action in this regard. There is every reason to commend this advanced step, and so few to condemn it.

DIRECT PRIMARIES V. CROOKED, JUGGLING CONVENTIONS.

Article 7, section 10, of the Arizona constitution provides:

The legislature shall enact a direct-primary election law, which shall provide for the nomination of candidates for all elective State, county, and city offices, including candidates for United States Senator and for Representatives in Congress.

I think there are few of us who longer cling to the vanishing and antiquated system of conventions and the varied and weird pranks that usually attend them. I think the number must be small who think nominations by convention better than by a direct vote of the people; for under the latter system every man, unmolested and in secrecy, may vote for the man of his choice after this has been accorded him, whether his choice be the voice of the majority or of the minority, he will have had his day in court. He will then, and not until then, with moderation and willingness abide by the everlasting good judgment of the majorities, the hope of the Republic, and the bulwark of us all. [Applause.]

I tell you, those sturdy people living on the broad prairies of the West, in constitution making, offer to the entire civilized world a beacon light in the embodiment of American liberties and human rights. You of the crowded East may and do know more of frenzied finance and its weird panics and pranks, but we of the West have higher regard for human liberties and human rights. We believe it is right to look after humanity first and property after. You of the East have been trained in a different school, where property rights come first and human rights and liberties last, if at all. I rejoice that Arizona recognizes the right of the humblest citizen at the ballot with equal sacredness with that of every other man. This law insures that right to him and will instill responsibility and patriotism in his breast to climb higher in the roll of citizenship.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN EXPENSES BOTH BEFORE AND AFTER ELECTION.

Article 7, section 16, of the Arizona constitution provides:

The legislature at its first session shall enact a law providing for general publicity, before and after election, of all campaign contributions to and expenditures of campaign committees and candidates for public office.

The wholesomeness of this provision needs little dilation or explanation. We have before us a concrete example. There is now a sitting Member of a legislative body other than the one to which I belong, a man who secured his seat in the Senate of the United States after the expenditure of $111,385.49 in his primary campaign. It is also true that his opponents in the same campaign spent sums respectively, as follows: $42,203.29, $30,002.07, and $11,063.88.

The filing of such reports after election can not but be the locking of the stable after the horse has been stolen. May we not pause and ask, With what can the honest, upright poor boy indulge his ambitions when men hold seats in legislative bodies at such figures as the ones just quoted? It must be nauseating and sickening to America's ambitious young men, who, it is true, have no titles to overcome but do have unreasonable wealth and unreasonable expenditures of money instead, which are quite if not equally as vicious and oppressive!

All hail to Arizona for her progress and fortitude to so well, in her infancy, safeguard the liberties of men that have too long been neglected by her older and more sedate sisters!

POWER TO INITIATE LEGISLATION BY THE PEOPLE—INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

Article 4 of the Arizona constitution provides:

SECTION 1. (1) The legislative authority of the State shall be vested in a legislature, consisting of a senate and a house of representatives, but the people reserve the power to propose laws and amendments to the constitution and to enact or reject such laws and amendments at the polls independently of the legislature; and they also reserve, for use at their own option, the power to approve or reject at the polls any act, or item, section, or part of any act, of the legislature.

(2) The first of these reserved powers is the initiative. Under this power 10 per cent of the qualified electors shall have the right to propose any measure, and 15 per cent shall have the right to propose any amendment to the constitution.

(3) The second of these reserved powers is the referendum. Under this power the legislature, or 5 per cent of the qualified electors, may order the submission to the people at the polls of any measure, or item, section, or part of any measure, enacted by the legislature, except laws immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, or for the support and maintenance of the departments of the State government and State institutions; but to allow opportunity for referendum petitions no act passed by the legislature shall be operative for 90 days after the close of the session of the legislature enacting such measure, except such as require earlier operation to preserve the public peace, health, or safety, or to provide appropriations for the support and maintenance of the departments of the State and of State institutions: Provided, That no such emergency measure shall be considered passed by the legislature unless it shall state in a separate section why it is necessary that it shall become immediately operative and shall be approved by the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the legislature, taken by roll call of ayes and nays, and also approved by the governor.

To me more beautiful and wholesome than all else is the right vested by the Arizona constitution which places in the hollow of the hand of each citizen full power to play his part in initiating legislation when recreant legislatures fail or refuse to act.

Under the Arizona constitution 10 per cent of the voters at the last regular election may propose legislation that they think desirous and have a vote thereon. If the majority approves it, it becomes a part of the statutes of the State.

If 15 per cent of the voters at the last election desire to amend the constitution, an election may be had thereon, and if a majority of the voters decree an amendment, it is by them inserted and becomes a part of the constitution.

Much has been said of late in the press and by different politicians about the fanaticism of such methods of legislation, but, as one who has for four years lived under its beneficent provisions and as one who has taken part in elections dealing with 14 items of legislation thereunder, it has no terrors for me. Such indictments to me seem faulty and untrue.

No party in our State is now seeking its repeal, and no party has sought its repeal since its enactment four years ago when we became a State. Our legislature has met once each year since our admission; our constitution is easy of amendment; the opportunity so to do has at all times been ample. The same charges were preferred against Oklahoma's constitution when it was formed, but four years' experience and the exercise of the right has taught us that their prophesies were weird, unworthy, and untrue.

I, tell you, sir, when perplexing questions arise in a State, questions that are full of sentiment and feeling, in which honest and strong men differ widely, there is no way to settle them so satisfactorily as to submit them to the will of the majority, which is to-day, was yesterday, and should ever be the just and most holy arbiter of us all.

When we depart from the will of the majority and refuse to abide its mandate, we embark on unknown seas of anarchy, disaster, and destruction. [Applause.]

I tell you, sir, the very hope of the Republic is the absolute reliance in the will of the majority honestly and fairly expressed at the ballot box, as distinguished from the secret pranks and bickerings of the few, assembled in some dingy committee room of some city council, legislature, or Congress, who operate under rules and bans of secrecy which the public can not fathom or understand.

It is altogether too often in this House asserted that the judgment of the plain people can not be trusted to act with moderation and calmness in matters of legislation and the preservation of their own rights. I share no such opinion, and extend to all such thinking persons a complete and sole monopoly on all such beliefs. I am willing to exempt that school of thought from the operation of every section of the Sherman antitrust law, and let them go on in error, deluded and alone. [Applause and laughter.]

Let me not be tedious, but as our answer to this unholy indictment against the intelligence of our people let me call your attention to the calmness and moderation with which the people of my State have, during the last four years, exercised the right, in each case dealing with knotty problems and perplexing ones that legislatures and Congresses too often dodge or refuse to act on at all.

As you will recall, Congress in admitting Oklahoma provided that she should have prohibition for 21 years. She did this, we assume, on account of our Indian population. Those citizens of our State who for reasons of their own were displeased with this limitation have twice availed themselves of the initiative plan to remove what to them was a barrier, but each time the people of the State elected to stand by the enabling act by handsome majorities, the first time by an approximate majority of 18,000, while at the last election, held on November 8, 1910, at the general election, the vote stood 105,041 "wet" as against 126,118 "dry." So while there will be those here and there who disagree with the majority result in this case—and there are those of my State who think the result unwise—still you can not say that we did not follow in the steps of the Congress that placed the provision in our enabling act and kept the everlasting faith. This, it seems to me, is but an humble example of a question full of sentiment where feeling ran high; still the people were not without calmness or without reason, and to-day I think I am not exaggerating when I say the question is more nearly settled in our State than it ever could be under the representative government operating alone.

The people can be trusted, and the indictment that they are not competent to legislate and vote intelligently on matters that deeply concern them is both faulty and unsound.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to his colleague?

Mr. FERRIS. I want to be as courteous with the gentleman as he has been with me, but I have but little time and I want to go as fast as I can.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman states that 14 propositions have been voted on. Does he know how many of them have been carried?

Mr. FERRIS. Two of them have been carried. Some of them have been referendum propositions. I will come to that in a moment.

In further reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Oklahoma I want to speak of some things we actually voted on. When Congress passed the enabling act and admitted us as a State, it provided as one of the many limitations that we should retain our capital at Guthrie, Okla., until the year 1913. The people chafed under that as an unusual and unwarranted limitation. Under the initiative they put it to a vote, and it was voted out of our constitution by more than three-fourths of the 75 counties of the State by a majority of 32,014. They say you can not trust the people as you can trust the Congresses and legislatures. But it is not so. The indictment will not stand. It is but the old adage that "The king can do no wrong," and such a theory has no place among Americans. To say that all of the people will err more quickly than one of the people is illogical, uncertain, and untrue. [Applause.] To so assault the voting population of this Republic is but to utter vile slander against the people who but yesterday placed the mantle of power about you. Why indict the intelligence of to-day that you applauded but yesterday?

Again, we may call your attention to a provision of the Oklahoma constitution known as article 9, it being in substance a provision against the merger of railroads without domestication. Twice the railroads, and many good people of our State who agreed with them about it, have under their rights petitioned for an election for the repeal of this section, and the elections have been held each time, sustaining the constitution by majorities of 54,421 in the first election and 27,994 in the second election.

It is quite true that the judgment of the people may, by those who do not agree with the results, be attacked, but the will of the majority honestly expressed at the ballot box can never be successfully attacked. [Applause.]

Again, I may call your attention to a question perhaps more sentimental than all the rest—that of woman's suffrage. The good women of our State said:

We are entitled to know the true sentiment of this State with reference to equal suffrage.

They exercised their rights under the initiative law, and the vote was had on November 8, 1910, the day of the regular election, and the vote was 88,808 for equal suffrage and 128,928 against it, rendering clear and emphatic the sentiment of the State by a majority of 40,120 against woman's suffrage. Who is there here that would deny those good women, who believe they ought to have the right to vote, to put it to a test of sentiment under this beneficent law? Who is there that can not recognize at a moment's glance what a jewel such a law is to settle and settle rightly and finally such questions full of sentiment and full of dissatisfaction until settled rightly?

I could go on, at the hazard of being tedious, and deal with all of the 14 questions initiated and referred in our State since statehood, but these show quite well the working and the desirability of the law.

THE REFERENDUM.

This is but the reverse of the same principle. This law merely permits the people of the State to sweep from the statute books laws that have crept in through inadvertence or corruption; laws that are offensive to the majority of its citizenship. In the Arizona constitution 5 per cent of the voters at the last election may petition for the repeal of any law particularly offensive to them and then the election ensues, and if a majority of the citizens qualified to vote and voting do not want the law to remain on the books, they simply vote it off. Nothing more and nothing less. We can all think of vicious acts of city councils, boards of county commissioners, and even legislatures that were personally obnoxious to practically all of the people and should be repealed, though too often impossible under the delegated government standing alone to eradicate or rid themselves of it. It has been said that the instances are rare when such a case would occur, but the principle of the referendum is as sound even if such a case did not occur once in an age. It would stand as a solemn sentry ever patiently guarding the people's rights, inexpensive and unpretentious when not in use, ever courageous and willing to act when encroachments and usurpation appear. [Applause.] Sometimes laws that appear honest and sound on their face are in fact faulty and unsound, still many are the times they are such questions that even a vote thereon would involve the political fortitude of the members thereof, and no action can be secured or accomplished through the old way. This statement I know is not entrancing and ennobling to refer to, but is a condition that exists and the truth of the statement is exemplified in legislatures and Congress almost every day. This will of course be answered by those who say, Send better men to the legislatures and Congress. Still that is not a reply, for the people have for more than a hundred years sent the best men they could find, still the condition is present. That admonition is and would be as good with this system as without it, and it does not answer the virtue of the principle or the necessity of correction of a condition that most of us know actually and in reality does exist. It is an evidence of intelligence and fortitude to ever repose in the people full power to protect themselves against usurpation and oppression which may or may not appear. The system is inexpensive and simple when not used; is not too powerful or unwieldy when used.

ENEMIES OF PEOPLE'S RULE CHARGE EXTRAVAGANCE TO THE SYSTEM.

This indictment of extravagance does not stand the searchlight of experience in my State, for the elections are usually held in conjunction with the general elections, and the cost of holding them is but slight. This, of course, is not true of urgent matters that must be voted on at intervals between elections, but if the grave conditions are present it is not too much to bear the expense of an election to correct it speedily. The disaster and evil effects that follow in the wake of a vicious law are more burdensome to a community than the expense of its removal by special election. Evil laws usually press down upon but few, while the expense of their removal will be borne by all of the citizenship. Hence the removal is both equitable and wholesome, while its retention is both blighting and unwholesome.

The average cost of special elections in our State is but $3,592, and we have had but 2 special elections out of 14 items voted upon, hence the cost to the taxpayers of our State in the full four years we have been operating under it will be less than $10,000, and would aggregate but $50,288 if every one of the 14 items voted on should have been dealt with at special elections. It is, I believe, not wide of the mark to say that when great and grave problems spring up in a State or community and greatly agitate the minds of a great Commonwealth, the expense of settling them under the initiative and referendum is the cheapest, the quickest, and the best way. It is again, in the light of our experience in Oklahoma, safe and just to say that the people's judgment is usually honest, safe, and calm. The charge that the people are a mob and a rabble is but a vile slander at the hands of those who agree to represent them. Such representatives, it seems to me, fall short of the common loyalty and decency that an agent usually accords his principal. Such representatives are misrepresenting more people than they represent.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM UNQUESTIONED.

No one, I think, has attacked this wholesome system of government on the ground of its unconstitutionality. Such charges would not be sustained if made. Courts have upheld laws so enacted every time they were brought in question, so far as my investigations have gone, the theory being that what a people could do by representatives they themselves could do without transgressing either the spirit or the letter of the Constitution. This being true, it resolves itself into a question of, Should the people have reinstated to them the power that through inadvertence and usurpation has crept away from them? Further, perhaps, to be more blunt, do the people know enough to be trusted with their own affairs when their agents fail to properly care for them? To me there is but one answer to each of the questions, and that is that they have absolute right in the first place and plenty of ability in the second place.

I was grieved to hear my friends on this floor exploit the theory of the people's lack of intelligence to pass intelligently on matters that concern them. I was grieved to hear them called "the rabble," "the mob," and use epithets even more severe than the ones just mentioned. I was again surprised to hear it said that the advocates of initiative and referendum were but the theories of the demagogue. In so saying they assault numerous States of this Union in their entirety. They assault some of the ablest thinkers in the land to-day. They assault Woodrow Wilson, a prominent candidate for President now. They assault Bryan, the purest and brainiest citizen in the land to-day. They assault a school of thought unworthy of such epithets.

NOT FAVORABLE TO THE ABOLISHMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT, BUT DESIRE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM USED IN CONJUNCTION WITH REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT.

To those without actual experience in the operation of the initiative and referendum and who have not had the time to go carefully into the working of this improved plan of government, I feel it my duty, at the hazard of having my position misunderstood, to tell you that I am in no manner favorable to the abolition of representative government, for it is my belief that it is the form of government that will ever be most used. It is, however, no less my emphatic position that the ever-vigilant safeguard of the initiative and referendum ought to be ever present so that always and forever the majority of the plain, tax-paying citizens may have full power to do those righteous things which the representative government fails to afford them, and likewise to rid themselves of the obnoxious and offensive legislation that creeps in through inadvertence or caprice. It is a wholesome provision that will inspire trust, responsibility, and patriotism within us. It will rid us and free us from the dangers of anarchy, revolution, and disintegration. It will be a solution of the perplexing questions by a majority vote which will ever well defend itself.

It may be suggested that it is a case of vested power never used; but if that were true, it does not serve as an indictment to its usefulness or faithful service. It is a safety valve that will ever be a solace of protection to the private citizen and can not but stimulate and prompt the delegate of delegated government to act more wisely, more honestly, more justly, and render better service to his employer, who is none other than the private citizenship of the land.

UNIVERSAL DESIRE TO TAKE MORE PART IN THE GOVERNMENT NOT ALONE WITH ARIZONA.

The opponents of popular government need not be deluded with the thought that this desire for improved methods of legislating comes alone from fair young Arizona and Oklahoma, for such is not the case. We find this patriotic ambition well disseminated among the people in the village, in the township, in the county, in the State, and in the Nation. The answer that it is violent and inoperative and revolutionary in character will not suffice to answer this universal desire to supplant that which is good by that which is its superior. I tell you, sir, whatever action you may take regarding Arizona, the eliminations from her wholesome constitution will not down with the coming morrow. This improved method of legislation is an issue in this country, and it is here to stay.

NOT AMONG THOSE WHO THINK GOVERNMENT AND MEN ARE GROWING WORSE AND MORE CORRUPT.

Some well-meaning persons have assigned as a reason for this great clamor for popular government in connection with delegated or representative government as provided by the initiative, referendum, and recall that the Government and men are growing more corrupt daily. I do not share any part of this opinion with any one of them. I am one of those who think the world has not yet seen its fairest and best day. I would prefer to share the belief of those who think to-day is better than yesterday and to-morrow will be better than to-day. Neither am I to be found among those who believe we had better men yesterday than we have to-day, for I do not believe that genius, patriotism, and greatness ever in the past ran more rampant than now. I think the world never was more full of patriotism and patriotic, courageous men. I think the increase for good, for honor, for courage, for genius, and intelligence will be more rapid as the fleeting years speed by. [Applause.]

The correct reason to assign for this activity and patriotic desire to improve our form of government is but the wholesome desire of our people to supplant that which is already good government with that which is thrice its superior. This is but the pathway of progress that will lead to perfection as a common goal. The representative government now enjoyed, walking hand in hand with the initiative and referendum as a safety valve to insure fair treatment at the hands of representative government, is the problem well solved. Fair Arizona has her face turned toward the light, and we should not befog or bedim her vision, which, so far as her State is concerned, may be clearer than our own. [Applause.] I would, if called on to do so, offer as an additional reason the fact that our Republic has grown from a handful of half-starved settlers in the beginning to a world power, and with it greed and avarice have made unusual strides. With great aggregations of wealth in the hands of the few, it is dangerous to leave the reins of government solely, without check, in the hands of the few.

If it were still true that wealth was but fairly well distributed among our people, the grave necessity for a more thorough distribution of power among the people might not be present, but with the wealth of the country rapidly reaching the hands of the few, in dealing with the power of government it should ever be more thoroughly distributed, rather than centralized. Naught but the keenest vision and foresight will ever be adequate to even fairly well safeguard the rights of the modest and unassuming against the ever-present greed of the few.

I tell you, sir, the wealth and prosperity of a nation should not be judged by the fortunes of the few. I would much prefer to belong to that school of thought who believe that the true test to determine the prosperity and happiness of a country is to observe how nearly absent hunger and want actually are among the industrious, law-abiding citizens thereof. The riches of the modern Dives is no certificate that will palliate the gnawing stomach of the hungry modern Lazarus. I would prefer to cluster around that group of citizens who believe that the most solid foundation stone of the Republic consists of our ability to ever keep the powers and responsibilities of government as well distributed among our people as is possible to do.

It has been suggested here by the most thoughtful minds of this House that the initiative and referendum is and would be too cumbersome of operation and unwieldy to be of service. While I long hesitate to differ with men of that thought, still I can not but conclude that, while at first blush it may appear cumbersome of operation, it will be wholesome in effect. I suggest the charge of "cumbersome" strikes alone at the method of carrying on government, while concentration strikes at the very fabric of government itself. The kingdom is less unwieldy than the republic, but who is there who advocates a kingdom? Who is there here that would exchange the beneficent results of a republic for that of any kingdom or king? We, as Americans, may differ in politics and policies. We may and do have parties and factions within our parties, but we have no such differences as these. Every thought of concentration is a step in the wrong direction. Every step toward distribution of powers is both American and ennobling.

History is replete with the downfall of great and glorious countries, due to overcentralization of powers, and never, I think, due to overdistribution of them.

Equal distribution of powers affords us a Nation made up of citizens with equal responsibilities and patriotism, and so long as we are equal in patriotism naught but victory can come to us when attacked from without. Cumbersomeness is and may well be referred to as an impediment, but it is not a deep-seated one that will amount to our undoing. It is not impossible of accomplishment, but easy of understanding instead. It leaves a contented people in its wake. Its burdens are light and equally divided.

If citizens are competent to vote on men to be their delegates to administer their governments, why not afford them the right to vote on the measure itself when it is objectionable to them? Experience teaches us they will not use the power except when grave abuses occur. The idle, incompetent agitator is as repulsive to the people as to the politician. The law can be nothing but the product of an agent of their own creation; nothing more, nothing less. Such an indictment that the people are not competent is surely demurrable in any forum of reason and logic. To conclude otherwise is but to conclude that all the people will err more readily than one of the same people. I can not be converted to such a belief. The placing of responsibility upon men is to make strong men stronger and weak men strong. The withholding of power and responsibility can be but the process of withering away of the talents of the citizen by the process of rust, disuse, and disintegration.

I think we could procure, even from our opponents of popular government, an agreed statement of fact to the effect that to allow the average citizen the right to exercise the right of franchise under the present form of government is but to make him a stronger and better citizen. Then where is the logic subject to attack which asserts that to let him have the right to vote on measures likewise makes him stronger? Strong men make strong countries and weak men weak ones. Surely there can be no exception to this self-evident rule.

The indictment filed against this plan, that people can not understand the laws, is not well taken, for some one has been cruel enough to utter the most truthful thought; that laws are sometimes more easily understood than the reason for their representatives' failure to enact them. To constantly attack the ability to do is but to revert to the adage that "The king can do no wrong," and that the people are but a "babbling rabble."

NOT ONE WHO THINKS INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM WILL CURE ALL ILLS OR ALONE BRING THE MILLENNIUM.

I do not belong to that hopeful and indulgent class of citizens who think this improved and popular government will free us of all the ills that befall governments and men, for after all we must, for our success and progress, largely depend upon the character, the intelligence, and patriotism of our plain citizens. Still this trueism, glaringly true and self-evident as it is, does not offer any reason why we should not ever be ready to supplant the already good government by a better government. To do otherwise is but to close the door to progress and advancement.

While I again repeat I do not think it will free us of all the pitfalls common to government and men, I do, with the thousands of patriotic men who crave it and desire it, enter into full fellowship with them in their every effort to acquire it.

Loyal, patriotic citizenship being the substantive part of our curriculum of Government, coupled with honest men to act in a representative capacity, with the ever-wholesome safeguard of the initiative to cure the crimes of omission and the referendum to cure the crimes of commission, this, as I believe, is the solution of most of the perplexing problems that do and will confront us as a Republic as the years speed by.

To those of us who really believe the rights of humanity are superior to the rights of greed this Arizona constitution is beautiful to look upon and sound at the core. As we read it we can not but conclude that it was made by men of the people who are in full accord with the people's rights and liberties.

To men who would make and who have made such a constitution no eulogy to or of them is fulsome or overdrawn. Naught but the kindest words should ever be employed of or concerning them while they are here, and the tenderest memories of them should abide with those of us that remain. Let the future be all to them that we hope it will be. Let not trouble or disappointment overtake them here or there. Their work will live after them, and live to bless and recommend them to their descendants generations after the poor words now employed in their eulogy shall have died away. [Applause.]

COURTS' TENDENCY TO LEGISLATE THINGS INTO THE LAW NOT THERE IN FACT.

I guess there is but few of us who do not long hesitate to criticize the decisions of our courts. I am sure this is and has at all times been the case with me, but as we have before our very eyes so flagrant a case of legislating things into the law by judicial interpretation in the Standard Oil case just decided I think it should not go unnoticed. As an additional excuse for the feeling of criticism within me, I might suggest the severe criticism of Justice Harlan, a long and trusted member of the court. The length of his dissenting opinion prevents my presentation of it in full, but I quote a portion of it, which is to me the most severe indictment of the judiciary I have ever observed from such a high source.

I here quote from Justice Harlan's dissenting opinion:

In the now not very short life that I have passed in this Capitol and the public service of the country the most alarming tendency of this day, in my judgment, so far as the safety and integrity of the institutions are concerned, is the tendency to judicial legislation, so that, when men having vast interests are concerned, and they can not get the law-making power of the country which controls it to pass the legislation they desire, the next thing they do is to raise the question in some case to get the court to so construe the constitution of the statutes to mean what they want it to mean. That has not been our practice.

I further quote:

The court, in the opinion in this case, says that this act of Congress means and embraces only unreasonable restraint of trade—in flat contradiction to what this court has said 15 years ago that Congress did not intend.

I quote further from the Harlan decision:

Practically the decision—I do not mean the judgment—but parts of the opinions are to the effect practically that the courts may, by mere judicial construction, amend the Constitution of the United States or an act of Congress. That, it strikes me, is mischievous, and that is the part of the opinion I especially object to.

If Justice Harlan is willing to say so much in so few words of the Supreme Court of the United States, why need we stand in such holy awe of allowing Arizona the right of recall of their judges of the Arizona courts, who must of necessity be of less ripe experience and more subject to error and caprice?

The action of our highest court in doffing the rôle of a judiciary and assuming, without constitutional authority, the rôle of legislators, I think can result in naught but a stinging disappointment to the well-meaning citizens of this country.

A few such decisions can but amount to the abolition of the functions of the legislative branch of our Government altogether. In this case the court has given the Standard Oil Co. the very thing that Congress has withheld from them for 15 years. This decision is not alone vicious and nauseating to those who complain of their encroachment of power in legislating into the laws things that are not there, but it even repeals that thing which Congress positively has given.

Their decision draws the line between good trusts and bad trusts, a distinction never intended by Congress and surely never desired by the people. It can, I think, amount to nothing short of a wholesale disregard of the true function of a judiciary, from which the people must suffer much. It brings but rejoicing to the Standard Oil Co., which is the chief recipient of this unwarranted decision. The joy afforded them from any source should be unmolested so long as their joy emanates from a true construction of the law, but when it comes from a strained construction, detrimental to the people and beneficial to the trusts, criticism can not be but just and wholesome. I think it is not wide of the mark to prophesy that as soon as the people understand what this decision really is it will increase their confidence and affection for Justice Harlan and cause them to marvel at the fact that none of the other members of the court joined him in his logic. I think those who in moments of frenzied belief that the court could do no wrong must feel at least disarmed and fettered in their further efforts to propagate such belief.

I can not but believe that this majority decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case is perhaps the most eloquent support that the truly American and democratic doctrine of recall has ever had uttered in its defense.

Section 1 of article 8 of the Arizona constitution provides:

RECALL OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

SECTION 1. Every public officer in the State of Arizona, holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State. Such number of said electors as shall equal 25 per cent of the number of votes cast at the last preceding general election for all of the candidates for the office held by such officer may by petition, which shall be known as a recall petition, demand his recall.

I can not conclude that our President will especially endear himself to the good people of Arizona in opposing them in their desire to incorporate the recall of officers in their new State constitution, for it is my belief that he has first transgressed the spirit and letter of the Federal Constitution when he meddles with the provisions of their State constitution so long as it is republican in form; and, second, he is denying them a wholesome law they may, and in all probability will, need while their State is new and conditions unsettled.

I tell you, sir, when a Territory is changing from a Territorial form to that of a State government, it too often happens that men are elected to office who are unknown and untried. Sometimes men so selected are honest, courageous, and square, but sometimes they are unworthy and unfair. In the fears that some of the latter class might unawares creep in, I am personally perfectly willing to give full sanction to Arizona in their incorporation of the recall of officers in their constitution. I am not personally so familiar with the practical workings of the recall, but to me it is in no manner offensive. It can not but be right in theory, and I am constrained to believe it is and will be right in fact. If we select a citizen to serve us in any representative capacity, and he serves us well, of course no majority will ever recall him, nor do I believe any small faction will even vainly seek his recall. I would prefer to believe that they will sustain him, uphold him, and confirm him instead. If we select a citizen who we think will serve us well, and he does not, where is the logic that can object to his removal by the people that intrusted him with power? He but yesterday derived his commission from them. What other tribunal would be so competent to possess the power of his removal?

Opponents of the recall cry aloud that it would wound the feelings of the officer recalled. We think this not a defense sufficient to the provisions and workings of the recall, for while it is quite true that to remove an unworthy officer is the wounding of the pride of but one citizen, it is also true that his obnoxious retention would wound the pride of the entire citizenship that placed the mantle of power about him.

It is charged that his political opponents would oust him unjustly from power. This we think untenable, for they were absent in power to defeat him at the beginning. They would be without power to oust him now. Hence, if ousted at all, it would be by reason of his unworthiness. Nothing other than this could have wrought the change.

I think it would not be stating the rule too broadly to say that the friends that intrusted him with power at the beginning would still be the friends that would retain him, confirm him, and glorify him. Unwarranted uses of the recall would but make the official stronger with his friends and weaken the determination of his adversaries. Warranted efforts to recall would in each case bring wholesome results as well.

I tell you, sir, the plain people will play few political pranks and remove few men unwarranted and without just cause. The politicians are usually the political prank players, if any there be, and not the rank and file of our citizenship. Our citizens are usually satisfied when they receive fair treatment at the hands of their officials.

As said before, I am not personally acquainted with the actual workings of the recall; I can not but firmly believe it will be the one superior agency that will pull up and eradicate the weeds of corruption and neglect now luxuriantly growing in by far too many of the fence corners of the legislatures and Congresses. I can not but sacredly believe that it will have none other than a wholesome effect upon every office and officer of a public character coming under its beneficent operation. I can not but think it will be an inexpensive and satisfactory way of cleansing any abuses of custom or corruption that may spring up in a Republic that is growing like the weed in fallow soil. I can not but think under all conditions it will exact of our every officer the best service there is within him, and surely we are entitled to the best.

I may be in error and alone in the belief, but I think I can see many wholesome effects the recall would have in this new State, and can think of but few, if any, disastrous or blighting effects that it would work on men or property.

If I mistake not, the dawn is breaking. A fairer day is at hand when representative government will be purer and better and will ever walk hand in hand with the initiative and referendum, ever submitting to the will of the majority, who may and will in the last analysis judge all things correctly and well. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Otto Praeger, a representative of the Dallas News, has written for his paper a series of articles dealing ably and well with the initiative and referendum.

He has gone into this very interesting subject at great length. I am very anxious to afford the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an opportunity to read his very interesting series of articles, hence I am printing them in connection with my remarks on the same subject.

INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL—HISTORY OF WORKINGS OF POPULAR CHECKS ON REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT — LEGISLATION BY PEOPLE—CONSTITUTION OF UNITED STATES PROVIDES FOR INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM IN NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

WASHINGTON, March 23.

Every republican form of government is safeguarded by one or two or three of the popular checks on representative government known as the initiative, the referendum, and the recall.

Of these three checks, the referendum is most general in use; the initiative is more general than is popularly supposed; while the recall, which in recent years has made forward strides in this country in municipal affairs, is perhaps the oldest check employed by the American people. It was specifically reserved to the Colonies in Article V of the Articles of Confederation under which our earliest Congresses met and conducted the affairs of the United States until the formation of the Constitution, and its most notable use was in 1776, when Pennsylvania recalled her delegates to the Continental Congress because they refused to sign the Declaration of Independence, and sent in their stead others who would.

RELATION TO PURE DEMOCRACY.

A brief consideration of the subject of government will readily suggest how the initiative, referendum, and recall came into existence; how the initiative, or power of the people at large to initiate legislation, is the very essence of pure democracy; the referendum, or compulsory reference of acts of legislation by representatives to the people for approval or rejection, is a check on representative government; and how the recall, or the power to remove an official from office at the will of the people, is a check on any form of government.

A republic may be either pure democracy or purely representative in form, though in practice no representative system ever gets so far away from the people who created it but that in course of time some of the forms of pure democracy do not grow up within it as checks against abuse.

OFFICERS AS PEOPLE'S AGENTS.

Pure democracy is that form of government in which all legislation is initiated and enacted by the people at large, instead of by a body of representatives, or legislators, its officers being merely the agents, recallable at will, to administer the laws ordained by the plebiscites. Such a government, it is contended, is possible, for physical reasons, only in small areas, and successful only when the individual sovereigns are trained in civic duties and have unity of aspirations. For this reason it succeeded temporarily and auspiciously in ancient Greece, and is to-day in successful operation in most of the cantons of Switzerland. Theoretically it does not tend to the greater national efficiency that is to be expected of those forms of government where a few specialize in the work of ruling, but it does tend to the political development of the whole people, and is regarded as being a truer reflection of the average intelligence and a truer response to the will and the aspirations of the whole community or nation, so that what is lost in the higher political development of the few is compensated by the civic development of the entire people.

EVERYDAY OPERATIONS.

Pure democracy is found in everyday life in such small organizations as clubs, societies, commercial bodies, and public meetings, and its limitations are those of time and space necessary to enable every man to participate in every occasion requiring the act of government. These limitations, naturally, confine it for successful operation to small bodies and to small areas. Its essence is that every individual sovereign or participant has his hand on the rudder of government at every stage of action, from the initiation and enactment of legislation to the details of proper administration in accordance with the expressed will of the ruling whole.

The pure democracy belong to the initiative and recall. The referendum logically finds no place in a system of government in which the acts of government originate with the people and which, obviously, need not be referred by the people back to themselves for approval or rejection. It has come into vogue with that other form or republicanism, representative government, not as an essential constituent, but as a check.

ANALOGOUS TO ABSOLUTISM.

All forms of government except pure democracy assume two classes—the rulers and the ruled. In an absolute monarchy the rulers sway according to their personal will, unhampered by limitations. In a constitutional monarchy they govern thus within the limitations of an organic law, these limitations being sometimes lightly considered, as in the German Empire under Bismarck, or as effective and far-reaching as in England at the present time.

Absolute monarchy is the absolutism of the few over the many. Its antithesis, and, paradoxical as it may seem, its analogy, is pure democracy, which is the absolutism of the many over the few. The analogy of the constitutional monarchy is pure representative government. Whereas under a constitutional monarchy one or a few may rule under limitations for life and by accident of birth, in a pure representative government one or a few may rule under limitations by reason of periodical elections. Pure representative government contemplates the complete surrender of the functions of government by the people to the judgment of the periodically selected administrators and legislators. It would create a condition of contract between principal (the people) and agent (the representatives), in which the agent operates with a free hand for the period of his employment, or election, so long as he acts within the law and without binding suggestions or instructions (initiative) from his principal, without reference of any act to the principal for approval or rejection (referendum), and without being subject to removal (recall) so long as his acts do not constitute some stipulated cause for removal. Thus, pure representative government, for which some contend even to this day, has no place in its philosophy for the initiative, referendum, or recall.

EXAMPLE OF PRECEDENT.

Under such a system the procedure in the creation of a nation or a State would be as follows:

1. The election by the people of representatives to make a constitution, without further control over their actions by the people and without requiring the submission of their work to the people for approval or rejection. The constitutions of Delaware, Mississippi, and South Carolina were not submitted to the people for approval, and in the States of Delaware and South Carolina even amendments to the constitution need not be submitted for ratification by the voters.

2. The election of representatives, legislative and administrative, likewise absolutely independent of the control of the people throughout the period of their election, provided they remain within the pale of the law, which stipulates the sole causes on which they can be removed.

THE PRESENT SAFEGUARDS.

Individual integrity, the desire of the good opinion of their fellow men, and the desire of reelection or promotion to higher office are the influences depended upon in pure representative government to insure conscientious performance of duties and fidelity to the pledges made to the public while seeking election to the offices which they are to administer without control or interference from those who selected them to serve.

But pure representative government does not exist. Everywhere and in every age it has been hedged in and modified by such checks as the initiative and the referendum, or both, and sometimes in addition by the recall. The Constitution of the United States itself did not become effective until three-fourths of the States ratified it either through conventions or State legislatures. Congress can not amend it. It can by a two-thirds vote of each Chamber in effect only recommend an amendment which must be ratified by three-fourths of the States, either through their legislatures or through specially elected conventions, to become effective. In addition to this referendum, the Constitution, in effect, provides another check, the initiative, by ordaining that the people, through the initiative of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States may direct Congress to submit to the legislatures or conventions of the various States amendments to the Constitution. The legislatures of almost three-fourths of the States already have availed themselves of this initiative by requesting Congress to submit for their ratification an amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct elections of Senators.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Some denounce the checks of popular government on representative government as undemocratic and out of harmony with our republican institutions when it is sought to make them applicable to the functions of Congress, States, and minor civil divisions in the passage of general laws; yet here, in the organic law of the land, are practically two of these checks, the initiative and the referendum, which the builders of the Constitution thought necessary to embody in that great work.

Again, it will be noted that legislators are not always opposed to giving the people the initiative and referendum. Thus the local-option laws of some States, notably Texas, provide that the county commissioners may of their own motion submit to the voters of the county, or a division thereof, the question whether it shall be unlawful to sell liquor in that county or division, and, further, that if the commissioners do not so act of their own volition, the people may invoke the initiative and referendum through a certain percentage of the voters requesting the commissioners to submit the question to a referendum vote.

Universally in vogue in this country is the compulsory referendum in the matter of certain forms of legislation, particularly in the creation of bonded indebtedness, and perhaps every State in the Union prescribes the referendum on ordinances authorizing the borrowing of money for counties, cities, or minor subdivisions.

NO RECALL PROVISION.

About the only one of the popular government checks which the American Constitution does not invoke is the recall. That institution, as it appears in the Articles of Confederation, was designed to enable constituencies to keep a constant hand on their Representatives in Congress. It read as follows:

"ART. V. For the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, Delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its Delegate, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year."

Within the last 10 years the introduction of these checks on representative government has made considerable progress in some parts of this country, particularly in the always-progressive West and Southwest, and the political bench mark to which the movement for more direct control over legislation and administration generally refers for the light of long and thorough experience, in that interesting Republic of monarchial Europe, the Swiss federation. With the operations of the various institutions of direct legislation in Switzerland and elsewhere abroad, the second paper of this series will deal.

INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL—OPERATION OF SYSTEM IN SWITZERLAND AND RESULTS THAT HAVE OBTAINED—IS BORN OF NECESSITY—ESTABLISHED TO STOP CONDITIONS SIMILAR TO THOSE IN THIS COUNTRY—RECALL NOT INVOKED.

WASHINGTON, March 31.

In 1850 only 5 out of the 25 Cantons and half Cantons of Switzerland had any form of cantonal referendum.

In 1860 fully 34 per cent of the Swiss people had the right of a referendum vote, while 10 years later, in 1870, not less than 71 per cent of the population was entitled to the referendum in cantonal legislation.

To-day the referendum, except in minor fiscal matters and certain urgent laws and decrees, is operative in every Swiss Canton except Freiburg, and in that Canton, in conformity with the federal constitution, amendments to the cantonal constitution must be submitted to a referendum.

To-day, also, the initiative, applicable to the enactment, repeal, or amendment of cantonal laws and general decrees, exists in every Canton except Freiburg, and again in this Canton the initiative is in vogue as applying to the proposal of amendments to the cantonal constitution.

REFERENDUM ON CONSTITUTION.

In 1874 Switzerland came under its present federal constitution, which provides the compulsory referendum not only for every amendment to the federal constitution and the optional referendum on application of 30,000 voters on general laws, but stipulates that every Canton must submit its proposed constitutional changes to a referendum.

In 1891 the Federal Congress took another important step by submitting to the people a constitutional amendment extending to them the right of proposing amendments to the constitution on the initiative of 50,000 voters, which amendment was adopted by the people. The next step, the application of the initiative to the enactment, repeal, or amendment of general federal laws, was formally broached by the Canton of Zurich in 1904, was debated at length in Congress, but was finally referred to the federal council, which is the executive body of Switzerland for further investigation. The council entered into correspondence with the various cantonal councils, but the latest literature on the subject does not disclose that either the Swiss Congress or the Swiss people, through the initiative, have been able to make up their minds to take the important step of creating the statutory initiative.

RELATION TO "LANDSGEMEINDE."

Thus briefly is sketched the extension and development of direct legislation in Switzerland. This development has been steadily toward the incorporation in national affairs of the same degree of direct control by the people of those affairs as they exercise in cantonal matters. With the exception of Freiburg, which has an almost pure representative form of government, the Swiss Cantons, in varying degrees, approach pure democracy in the conduct of their political affairs. In them the germ of direct legislation survived from the primitive methods of communal legislation, when the residents of the communes, as is the practice in some New England townships to this day, met in mass meeting at stated periods, proposed laws, and debated and enacted them by the count of upraised hands. This method was gradually extended to the larger affairs of some of the cantons, and to-day the following two Cantons and four half Cantons, Uri, Obwalden, Nidwalden, Glarus, Appenzell interior, and Appenzell exterior, are still legislating in this primitive democratic fashion. This is the "landsgemeinde," or land-community system, and these meetings have been participated in by as high as 10,000 Swiss voters, who thus dispose of proposed constitutional amendments, passage of general laws, and the election of officers. In most of the Cantons, however, legislatures have taken the place of the "landsgemeinde," but as checks on these legislatures there has come into existence in every Canton, except Freiburg and the "landsgemeinde" Cantons, the initiative and referendum on all general laws of the Canton.

SWISS LEGISLATIVE BODIES.

The country in which these advances toward pure democracy have been made is a Republic, in many respects similar to, and again in some vital respects essentially different from, the form of government in the United States. Switzerland is composed of 22 Cantons, 3 of which are partitioned into half Cantons. These Cantons in modern development were first bound together by the constitution of 1848 into a confederacy in a manner like our own colonies by the Articles of Confederation, and were finally welded into a firm national entity by the constitution of 1874, as were the United States by our own Constitution of 1790.

The Swiss Federal Government has a legislative body called the Federal Assembly, which is composed of two houses—a Senate, or Council of State, constituted of two members from each Canton, and a Lower House, constituted of one representative for each 20,000 inhabitants, who is elected for three years. The Swiss Senate has no such power over treaties or appointments as has the American Senate. It is, in fact, but a second legislative chamber, coequal with the Lower House.

NO REAL PRESIDENT.

There is also a President and a Cabinet, but not in the American sense, for the Swiss, neither in their national affairs nor in their cantonal affairs, give to any single man the power that the Americans put in the hands of a President, a governor, or a mayor. The federal executive control in Switzerland is vested in a federal council of seven members, elected by the Federal Congress in joint session, with one of its members named as President of the Republic, but who in reality is only the presiding officer of the Federal Council. This executive council serves for three years. Its presiding officer, the President of Switzerland, is elected for one year and can not be his own successor. His salary is $2,605 per year, which is about $300 a year more than the other members of the council receive. The councillors may not engage in private business or practice a profession while holding office. They have a "consultative" voice in Congress, but no vote. The general decrees of the council, as well as the laws of the Federal Congress, with certain exceptions, are always subject to a referendum on the application of 30,000 voters.

THE JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

Such, in brief, are the legislative and executive branches of the Swiss Republic. The judiciary is no less interesting. A Canton usually has four sets of courts. One is an arbitration tribunal having jurisdiction principally in the matter of disputes between employers and employees. Then there is what we would call the justice of the peace court, in which the justice first sits as an arbitrator in an effort to bring the contestants together so as to avoid litigation. If he fails, then he sits as a magistrate and decides the case as such. Next, there is a higher court which has jurisdiction over a district, or division, of the Canton; and above that is what we would call a State supreme court, which has final jurisdiction in a Canton. All judges are elected for varying terms, ranging from one to eight years. In addition to the cantonal courts there is a federal court, which settles disputes between the Cantons themselves and between the Cantons and individuals. This court, however, can not pass on the constitutionality of any federal act or nullify any federal law. This can be done by congress alone, subject always to the referendum.

The inability of their highest court to reconcile conflicts between federal laws and the constitution does not appear to perturb the Swiss greatly. In fact, it is not clear where there is any need for a constitution at all when that instrument may be changed at will by a mere majority vote of the people in a majority of the Cantons, on the initiative of either the Federal Congress or 50,000 voters, while a law may be changed only on the initiative of congress and with the consent of a majority of the people, if a referendum is demanded. If congress is opposed to the change, it is easier to change the constitution than the law, because the Swiss permit the people to initiate a constitutional amendment, but not a statutory amendment.

This anomaly in government has resulted in the strange incorporation in the constitution, instead of in the law, of the ordinance against slaughtering animals by bleeding without first stunning them. Due in part to racial animosity and in part to a crusade by humane societies against the slaughtering methods of the "kosher" butchers, the Swiss sought in vain to get a federal law against this method of slaughtering, but having no statutory initiative, they fell back on all they had—the right to initiate constitutional amendments—and by a majority of 64,000 wrote into the constitution the provision that they had no means of writing in the statutes.

PEOPLE LIKE NEW SYSTEM.

This brings us to the questions: How do the Swiss feel about the initiative and referendum? How generally and how intelligently do they participate in these legislative votings?

Prof. Frank Parsons, in his study of the Swiss Government, makes this answer to one question:

"I did not find one man who wanted to go back to the old plan of final legislation by the elected delegates without a chance of appeal to the people."

As to the other question, the statistics and the records, studied in the light of the purpose of these instruments for direct legislation, bear interesting testimony which is variously interpreted by those who have delved into this fruitful subject.

It is a matter of common criticism of the Swiss system of direct legislation that except in the Canton of Zurich, where failure to vote is punishable by a fine, only a part of the people, usually about one-half, participate in the referendum. That the attitude of the Swiss is to let those who believe that they understand the proposition to be voted upon decide its fate is indicated by the fact that in Zurich, where voting is compulsory, there are always a large number of blank ballots cast on the pending proposals. It is also asserted that a large number of people out of an abundance of caution vote against the adoption of a law or an amendment which they do not understand or as to the effect of which they are not certain.

PERCENTAGE OF VOTING CITIZENS.

An instance of this state of things is found in the vote on the constitutional amendment to extend to the people the power of the initiative in proposing amendments to the constitution. Out of 641,692 registered voters only 303,628 voted—183,029 for the initiative and 120,599 against it. In Cantons where voting is compulsory from 94 to 97 per cent of the registered vote was cast, while in other Cantons only from 10 to 19 per cent of the voters participated in the referendum. Commenting on this situaton, Simon Deploige, the Belgian publicist, who is a sharp critic of direct legislation, says: "It is a little ridiculous to talk of legislation by the people where more than one-half of the citizens refuse to exercise their legislative rights."

Other publicists, however, point out that the Swiss have incorporated the initiative and referendum in their political machinery not to have the people do all of the legislating, but to hold over the legislators a club in the shape of the initiative to compel them to direct legislation along the desires of the people at large and to exercise as a veto against pernicious legislation the referendum. That practically all of the legislation for Switzerland is still done by the Federal Congress or the cantonal legislatures is shown by the fact that in the first 20 years of the existence of the present constitution the referendum was demanded in regard to but one-sixth of the laws passed by the Federal Congress, leaving five-sixths of the legislation of that body to become laws unchallenged. Only one-tenth of the laws passed by the Swiss Federal Assembly were rejected on referendum. In that time the Federal Assembly proposed seven constitutional amendments, of which the people rejected six and accepted one. In the first six years after the initiative on constitutional amendments became effective, which was in 1892, the people proposed six such amendments to the constitution, of which one was accepted and five rejected on referendum. When a constitutional amendment proposed by the initiative of the people is voted upon, it must obtain not only a majority of all votes cast, but a majority in a majority of the Cantons in order to become effective.

MANY MEASURES DEFEATED.

The record of the initiative in the Cantons is just as illuminating. The most frequently cited example is the record of Zurich, between 1869 and 1885, inclusive. In those 16 years there were proposed through the initiative 18 measures, of which only 4 obtained the sanction of the cantonal legislature, and of these 4 the people, on referendum, rejected 2 and accepted 2. In the fifth case the legislature offered a substitute for the initiative proposals, the substitute being adopted by the people. Of the 13 proposals which the legislature disapproved, the people, on referendum, adopted 3 and rejected 10. The 3 laws adopted against the judgment of the legislature were: Establishment of a house of correction for the reformation of tramps; the reestablishment of the death penalty, which was subsequently reabolished; the abolishing of compulsory vaccination. The experience in Zurich is cited by opponents of the Swiss system as showing that the initiative and referendum are too easily made the vehicle by which the passing storms and spasms of public opinion can be enacted into unjust or harmful laws.

Enough has been shown in this brief survey of the two principal instruments of direct legislation in the Swiss governmental machinery to indicate their defects as well as their merits. These defects appear to lie largely in the details of the working, as, for instance, in the small number of petitioners that can force the consideration by the electorate of legislation, the frequency of resulting elections, and the lack of those safeguards that would tend to give greater stability to the constitution than to change the new statutes. In some Cantons the annoyance of frequent elections has been obviated by the institution of the compulsory in place of the optional referendum, held at stated periods, sometimes once a year and sometimes twice a year, at which all general laws and decrees, except those of an urgent character and those dealing with detailed fiscal matters, as the division of the budget allowances, are voted upon at one time.

In this article no reference has been made to the institution called the recall. The student has to look hard and long in the literature on popular government in Switzerland to find a discussion of the recall or its application. The short terms for which Swiss Government officials hold office, the direct control over the acts, not only of the legislators, but of the executive council of the Federal Government as well as of the Cantons, appears to have obviated the necessity for instrument of popular will which has been found necessary and successful in some communities of our own representative form of government. The recall is a check on the personal equation of almost unrestricted representative government, whereas in Switzerland the powers of the persons elected to office have been reduced to a minimum through the direct control of the people by means of the initiative and referendum over the acts of the representatives.

"Prior to the referendum," says John Roger Commons in his essay on the Swiss Government, "Switzerland was going through an era of political villainy quite similar to that which the American people know so well. In fact, Swiss politics from 1830 to 1860 reads quite like a chapter in current America. It was no abstract philosophy or democratic instinct that brought the referendum. The people were driven to it as the only certain means of expelling corrupt wealth from politics. The Canton Vaud adopted it immediately following an especially exasperating grant of subsidy to a railroad corporation. Other Cantons followed. Switzerland was rescued from evils that now threaten other democracies. No longer could lawmakers sell out the people; they could no longer 'deliver the goods.' The people themselves must ratify the bargain."

A contrary view of the Swiss system, especially as to the possibility of its incorporation into our own political machinery, is that of Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, who says:

"Conventions and caucuses with us take the place which the initiative is meant to fill in Switzerland. So different are the conditions in the two countries that the success of the referendum in one does not at all imply that it would work well in the other; while if the referendum has disappointed friends in Switzerland, where it harmonizes with other institutions, it is not likely to succeed in the United States. A national referendum would nullify the Senate and hence be a complete change in the American system of government and probably a national misfortune."

The common fear is expressed that the initiative and referendum would usher in an era of radicalism, but such is not the conclusion reached by Abbott Lawrence Lowell, who points out that radicals in Switzerland oppose the extension of these institutions to general legislation, because the Swiss experience shows that instead of being a means of radical advance, it has proven a powerful influence for conservatism. In discussing this phase of the subject in an article in the Atlantic Monthly, Mr. Lowell says:

"Several very marked tendencies are observerable in the treatment by the people (of Switzerland) of the various measures submitted to them. The first of these is a tendency to reject radical laws, especially those that are in any way extreme, for in both the Federal and cantonal matters the people have shown themselves more conservative than their representatives. It is clear that in Switzerland a measure can not pass unless it is so thoroughly ripe that there is a good deal of agreement of opinion about it, and it is equally clear that the people are less willing than their representatives to try experiments in legislation."

Upon the experience of the Swiss the advocates of direct legislation as checks on the system of representative government in this country have drawn for guidance and inspiration. The progress that has been made in the United States in this direction, the adaptation of the Swiss system to our conditions, its elaboration and inclusion of the recall, will be the theme of the third article of this series.

DIRECT LEGISLATION WITHIN THE STATES—INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM IN PRACTICAL OPERATION IN FIVE COMMONWEALTHS—ACTS AS MUNICIPAL CLUB—MOVEMENT FOR PURE DEMOCRATIC CONTROL OF LAW-MAKING OR REJECTION PROCEEDS ON TWO LINES.

WASHINGTON, April 7.

In five States of the United States, having an aggregate population of 7,774,760, the initiative and referendum, applicable to constitutional amendments and general State laws, is in practical operation. In three States, having an aggregate population of 1,702,312, the initiative and referendum is in operation applicable only to State laws. In one State, Nevada, with a population of 81,875, the referendum, without the power to initiate legislation, is in operation as regards State laws. In addition, there is a compulsary referendum on constitutional amendments in effect in every State of the Union, except Delaware and South Carolina.

Furthermore, 9,535,133 people have the right of initiative and referendum in regard to making known public sentiment on vital public questions, which ascertained results, however, is not binding on the legislatures. This system prevails in Illinois and Texas.

FURTHER PROGRESS THAN SWITZERLAND.

Thus, it will be seen that direct legislation has progressed further in the United States than Switzerland to this extent: That, whereas in Switzerland 3,315,433 people have the right of initiative and referendum in regard to constitutional amendments, and only the referendum on general State laws, 7,774,760 people in five States of the United States have the right of initiative and referendum as to constitutional amendments and also the initiative and referendum in regard to State laws. The extent of direct legislation, binding on State legislatures in the United States, is told in the following tabular summary:

TABULATED SUMMARY.

	Population.
Initiative and referendum applicable to constitutional amendments and State laws:
Arkansas	1,574,449
Missouri	3,293,335
North Dakota	577,056
Oklahoma	1,657,155
Oregon	672,765
Total	7,774,760
Initiative and referendum applicable to State laws and not to the constitution:
Maine	742,371
Montana	376,053
South Dakota	583,888
Total	1,702,312
Referendum on general State laws:
Nevada	81,875
Initiative and referendum to obtain public sentiment, not binding on legislature:
Illinois	5,638,591
Initiative and referendum within party primaries, not binding on legislature:
Texas	3,896,542

From this tabulation it will be seen that in the United States 9,558,547 people may exercise, in a binding way and in varying degrees, the two principal checks of popular over representative government, namely, the initiative and referendum.

GREATEST PROGRESS IN STATES.

In Switzerland direct legislation began in the communes or municipalities, and subsequently extended to the Cantons, or States, while with us direct legislation on a large scale has made its greatest progress with the States, and is rapidly being extended in general matters to the municipalities. The result is that, while in Switzerland direct legislation is practically universal in the municipalities, in the United States it either is limited in application or, where it covers the whole subject of municipal legislation and administration, it is limited to a few States and to a small part of the aggregate population of the country.

Direct participation by the people of the United States in legislation is confined to States and their minor civil divisions. In nothing relating to the Federal Government can a direct vote be had, except in the matter of electing Members of the House of Representatives of Congress. While there exists the principle of both the initiative and the referendum in the process of amending the Federal Constitution, it is available only to the State legislatures and not to the people directly. On the other hand, everything in the way of State government, save the making of laws, is settled by a direct vote of the people, including, except in Delaware and South Carolina, compulsory referendum amendments to the State constitution.

PLAN TAKING ROOT RAPIDLY.

But rapidly there has been taking root in the States the plan of extending to the people the same right, at their option, of ratifying or rejecting general laws as they have of ratifying or rejecting State constitutional amendments, but where this movement has taken hold the people, except in Nevada, have obtained the right to initiate or propose laws as well as to ratify or reject them.

The movement for the introduction of popular checks on representative government in this country has proceeded on two distinct lines in State and municipal affairs. In State matters the greatest development has been in the application of the initiative and referendum as checks on the legislatures, with only a few instances of the recall applying to State administrative officers. In municipal affairs the greatest development has been in the introduction of the recall, with the initiative and referendum, or the referendum alone, in a secondary position. This seems to arise from the fact that in State affairs the legislature exercises a function that is closer in with the immediate concern of the people than are the administrative acts of the State officials, whereas the larger police powers of the municipal administrations brings them in closer touch with the individual citizen. Hence the initiative and referendum in State legislation gives the public control over that branch of State government that concerns them most directly, and with this power to direct and veto the acts of the legislators, the recall has not been considered of prime importance in State affairs. In fact, only Oregon has the recall, applicable to State officials, including the judiciary, but it has never invoked this agency. On the other hand, by the use of the recall, a club is held over the aldermen and the administrative officers of the cities, and therefore has been first seized upon as a controlling agency in municipalities. But in a legislative way the recall can have the effect only of a deterrent, and hence, for a more complete control over aldermanic statesmanship the development in direct legislation in municipalities has been toward the introduction of the initiative and referendum.

GROWTH OF PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

The growth of public sentiment for power to exercise the right of initiating or vetoing legislation by the people is due to a vital defect in our representative form of government which does not provide the means of making a representative, during his term of office, live up sincerely to the promises and representations on the strength of which he was elected to serve his constituents. In our form of government the voters surrender to the representatives all control over government for a period of two, four, or six years, and they can not exercise their convictions as to governmental policy except through electing such men to represent them as promise to enact those convictions into laws. Those promises usually are given in the form of party platform pledges on which the candidate for office seeks the vote of the people. There, however, the control of the voter over governmental policies in the United States ends. There is no sure way to hold the representative to account if he violates the pledges in his platform. He can not be disturbed during the entire period of his election, no matter how grossly he breaks every pledge he gave in order to win enough votes to elect him to office. In this connection it is pointed out that, while it is true that the people need not reelect him at the expiration of his term, it is also true that, if he is a plausible excuse-maker or a good political-machine builder, or can inject into the campaign a lively diverting issue, he frequently slips back into office on the strength of his plausible personality, or through the power of his machine, or by reason of his skill in directing the campaign so as to center fiercely around some diverting issue. But even if he is not reelected, there is no way to keep him from misrepresenting the people during his first term.

Thus, to enable the people to go over the heads of politicians who become no longer responsive to the public will, or who violate their platform pledges, the initiative and referendum has been devised. In a like manner the recall is designed to enable the people to remove an officer whose acts do not square with his promises, or whose policies have grown out of harmony with those of the people whom he was elected to represent.

LITTLE TROUBLE WITH LEGISLATORS.

The Swiss experience is that with the initiative and referendum in effective operation little trouble is experienced with the legislators, for they can no longer block reforms nor put through corrupt deals unless the people give their consent thereto in the event that such deals are challenged by a referendum. Therefore the recall has its main use in its application to administrative officials who may be out of harmony with the policy and sentiments of the community, generally in fiscal, law enforcement or public development matters. That is the reason given why the recall has been seized upon so eagerly by municipalities, especially in ring-ruled communities.

MODERN MOVEMENT IN 1898.

The modern movement in behalf of the initiative and referendum as checks on State legislatures bore its first fruit in 1898, when South Dakota adopted it in reference to general laws by a vote of 23,000 to 16,000. As to its results in South Dakota, former Gov. Charles N. Herriard, of that State, is quoted in Senate document No. 529, first session of the Sixtieth Congress, as testifying thus:

"Since the referendum has been a part of our constitution we have had no chartermongers nor railroad speculators, no wildcat schemes submitted to our legislatures. Formerly our time was occupied by speculative schemes of one kind or another, but since the referendum has been a part of our constitution these people do not press their schemes on the legislature, hence there is no necessity for having recourse to the referendum."

OREGON PLAN WORKED OUT.

Four years after South Dakota adopted this system Oregon came to the fore with what many considered to be the most carefully worked-out plan for initiative and referendum applicable to the State constitution and State laws that has yet been devised. It was adopted by a vote of eleven to one, the exact figures being 62,024 for and 5,668 against the plan. The Oregon plan, in brief, provides that every initiative petition must contain the full text of the proposed measure, must be signed by not less than 8 per cent of the legal voters, and must be filed at least four months before the time of the election at which it is to be voted on. A referendum petition must have the signatures of 5 per cent of the voters and be filed not more than 90 days after final adjournment of the legislative assembly. A majority vote makes any measure a law. This is the Oregon plan as embraced in the constitutional amendment of 1902. In 1907 a law was enacted designed to perfect the system. It provides the following detail for the publication and distribution of the proposed measures, with arguments for or against them, which provision is the striking characteristic of the Oregon plan:

STRIKING OREGON CHARACTERISTICS.

Before any election at which any proposed law or amendment to the constitution is to be submitted to the people, the secretary of state is required to have printed in pamphlet form the text of each measure to be submitted, together with the title as it will appear on the official ballot. Parties filing initiative petitions have the right to file any arguments advocating such measures. In the case of the referendums any person has the right to file arguments for or against the referred measures. The parties offering arguments for distribution must pay all expenses for paper and printing to supply one copy with every copy of the measure to be printed by the State. The cost of printing, binding, and distributing the measures proposed, and of binding and distributing the arguments are to be paid by the State as a part of the State printing. Within a specified time before any election at which measures are to be voted upon the secretary of state is required to transmit copies of each measure, together with the arguments submitted, to the voters within the State.

At the general election on November 8, 1910, the people of Oregon voted on 32 initiative and referendum proposals, which, together with arguments pro and con, filled a 208-page pamphlet, thoroughly indexed. The ballot with these amendments and the names of candidates, from Congressman to constables, made a poster almost the size of one page of the average daily newspaper. It took the voters from two and a half to six minutes to mark their ballots. Commenting on the result of this particular election, Frederic C. Howe, in a recent magazine article, says:

SUBJECTED TO SEVERE TEST.

"Direct legislation was subjected to its severest test in 1910, when 32 measures, covering the greatest variety of questions, were submitted to popular verdict. It was generally believed the people could not discriminate between so many measures, some of them in conflict and a considerable number involving expert knowledge and taxation, legal procedure, educational and industrial conditions.

"Of these measures 9 were approved and 23 defeated, many of the latter by decisive majorities. Fifteen of the measures were put forward by local interests for the division of counties, for normal schools, and asylums. These were generally defeated, as was the woman's suffrage amendment and the resolution for a constitutional convention."

Among the constructive results of this election was the enactment of a law providing for a verdict in civil cases by three-fourths of a jury, instead of by the verdict of 12 men, and also the simplification of the judicial procedure, by which the supreme court is directed to enter judgment in a civil suit if, from all the testimony presented, it is evident to the superior court that the verdict in the trial court is a just one.

CRITICS POINT OUT WEAKNESS.

While in the opinion of its advocates the initiative and referendum suffers nothing by reason of the multiplicity of measures submitted to the people, this very fact, as is evidenced by the Oregon elections, is regarded by its critics, who are not necessarily its opponents, as an element of weakness in the system. Prof. Lowell, in an article in the Atlantic Monthly, points to a number of contradictory and illogical measures submitted at various times to the people of Oregon through the initiative, some of which have been adopted and some rejected, and to him it seems that the initiative will eventually result in a hodgepodge of law, full of reconcilable contradictions. In some of the Swiss Cantons this criticism has been met by provisions requiring the legislatures to submit to the people their judgment in the way of a favorable or unfavorable report on, or a substitute bill of its own for, every initiative proposal. The people, then, at the polls accept or reject the advice of their representatives.

PLAN SERVES AS MODEL.

The Oregon plan has served as the model, in whole or in part, for other States. In rapid succession the system spread to North Dakota, Missouri, and Oklahoma, the latest State to adopt the initiative and referendum being Arkansas. The California Legislature has recently passed an amendment to the constitution providing for the initiative and referendum and recall, which is yet to be voted upon by the people, and now there is knocking at the door for admission into the Union Arizona, with a full-fledged initiative, referendum, and recall, modeled after the Oregon law, and demanding that it be not denied admission because it proposes to have the same system which another State already has, and which it contends every other State can have if the people choose to so amend their constitutions.

PUBLIC LAW OF ILLINOIS.

Compared with this system the recent operation of the public-opinion law of Illinois is interesting. This law provides that not more than three questions for an expression of popular opinion may be submitted to the people on the initiative of 10 per cent of the voters of the State. This plan has been in operation since 1901. It has resulted in very decisive expressions of public opinion on public questions, but on the whole it has produced little legislation in accordance with those expressions on the more important matters, because the legislatures were not bound by the results of these elections. The latest instance is the overwhelming vote in favor of the initiative and referendum. On this proposition more than 570,000 votes were cast, and the result in favor of the initiative and referendum was nearly 4 to 1. The present legislature, in disregard of such an overwhelming expression of sentiment, has failed to enact the system into law.

HOPELESS SYSTEM IN VOGUE.

It is almost amazing what a large vote is cast, year after year, in Illinois, under such a hopeless system. In fact, the number of votes cast on referendum in the United States generally is interesting. In Oregon the total average vote cast for all candidates was 102,500, while the highest number of votes cast on any one measure was 104,100, and the lowest, on a bill to create a new county, was 68,326, the average on the 32 measures being 85,042. The highest vote cast on any one proposal was within 6,000 of the whole vote cast for President in 1908. Such results are important when it is considered that one of the most frequent criticisms of the initiative and referendum in Switzerland is that, as a rule, except in the Cantons where voting is compulsory, less than half of the voting strength is polled on referendum elections. More than half as many votes were cast under the impotent public-opinion system of Illinois recently as were cast for President in that State in 1908. It is an indication of greater popular interest, if not greater competency, in the exercise of the right of direct legislation in the United States than in Switzerland.

In this article no mention has been made of the extension of the initiative and referendum to cities. In American municipalities it is usually associated with the recall, and the next article of this series will deal with the subject of the recall in States and cities in this country, the battle for its introduction, and some notable instances of its application.

DIRECT LEGISLATION AND ITS WORKINGS—HISTORICAL AND MODERN REVIEW OF INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL—MEASURES POWERFUL—SENTIMENT OF RECALL DATES BACK TO EARLY HISTORY OF FEW STATES—WHERE USED.

WASHINGTON, April 13.

The recall is less of an innovation in American constitution making than are the referendum or initiative. The recall was written into the first Constitution of the United States, known as the Articles of Confederation. The fathers, to whose sagacity public men so frequently refer, wrote it into Article V of that instrument in unmistakable terms, when, in providing for the election of Delegates to the National Congress, they reserved to each State the power "to recall its Delegates or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year." When the delegates to the Constitutional Convention undertook to write a new organic law for the Nation they created the second chamber of Congress, the Senate, and left out the recall provision of the Articles of Confederation.

But there is another constitution, older than the Constitution of the United States, into which the fathers wrote a recall sentiment—the constitution of the State of Massachusetts. The recall is in that instrument to this day and will be found in Article VIII, which reads:

"In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish in their frame of government to cause their public officers to return to private life, and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments."

In keeping with the spirit of this provision Massachusetts elects her State officers for but one year.

Former United States Senator Blair, of New Hampshire, calls attention to the fact that "the power of removal of the judiciary by address of the two houses of the legislature existed, and perhaps still exists, in the State of New Hampshire, while the entire judiciary has been changed frequently by the legislature, and the courts, since I can remember, about four times."

IN USE IN OREGON.

Coming down to the present day and to the power of the recall vested directly in the hands of the people, the record shows that Oregon has had the recall, applicable to all elective State officers, judicial, administrative, and legislative, for the last three years. It was written into the constitution through direct legislation, the constitutional amendment providing for it being adopted by a vote of 58,381 to 31,002. In Oregon the recall on State officers can be invoked on the application of 25 per cent of the legal voters. This agency of control, however, has not been invoked by the people of that State since its adoption. In this respect the experience of Oregon is similar to that of Switzerland, where the recall is found in about one-third of the Cantons, but is rarely invoked. As a matter of fact, the Swiss have a way of continually reelecting their public officers, so that a competent man in office is there for practically all of his life.

The recall, as affecting State officials, has not yet gone beyond Oregon, but is incorporated in the proposed constitution for Arizona, and just recently has been submitted to the people of California by the legislature of that State. The California proposal also provides for the initiative and referendum, and the situation there in regard to the application of the recall to the judiciary is particularly interesting. In an extended article in the New York Evening Post on the recent political revolution in California, written before the legislature voted to submit a constitutional amendment granting to the people the right to recall judges, appears this statement and prophecy by Chief Justice Beatty, of the California Supreme Court:

"A special committee of the legislature is to investigate the most recent decision of the supreme court in the Ruef case, granting the former boss a rehearing of his case in the supreme court. This decision has now been reversed and Ruef is at last behind the bars. Chief Justice Beatty, of that court, in a public statement says that he expects the legislature to pass a recall amendment, that a movement will be begun to recall the supreme court judges, and that the movement will be successful."

COL. ROOSEVELT FAVORS ADOPTION.

Commenting on the situation in California, former President Roosevelt, in an interview published by the Associated Press, said that personally he would prefer to see the legislature itself act in the matter of recalls by providing for the removal of an unfit judge by a majority vote of each house without trial, but on assignment of reasons. "That some of your judges have been placed upon the bench under the old convention system, in response to the demands of special interests, I little question," Col. Roosevelt is quoted as saying. "The legislature, however, has preferred to put the responsibility of their recall upon the people themselves, and therefore you are faced by the alternative of leaving the present system unchanged or else adopting the amendment proposed. In the immediate emergency there is no other choice, and this being the case, I feel strongly that the amendment should be adopted."

While, however, the recall is still rare in its application to State officials, whether legislative, administrative, or judicial, it has spread rapidly in various parts of the country in city governments. In almost every instance of its application to local affairs it is accompanied by the initiative and referendum. There is no complete list showing the recall, initiative, and referendum in cities to date, because the movement of extending direct legislation in cities is going on almost from day to day, but the following summary will indicate the extent to which these three instruments of direct control over municipal affairs has developed in the United States:

In Iowa, by a general statute, the recall is granted to every city having a commission form of government, and any city of 25,000 or more may adopt the commission form of government.

In South Dakota there is the same kind of a general law, except that in that State any city of the first or second class or any city having a special charter may change to the commission government, the recall in South Dakota cities being effective upon the application of 15 per cent of the legal voters.

In Oregon in 1906 the people, by a vote of 46,678 to 16,735, extended to every city in the State the initiative on the application of 15 per cent and the referendum on the application of 10 per cent of the qualified voters.

HOME RULE TO THE CITIES.

The next thing to the Oregon constitution and general law granting home rule to the cities is the constitution and statutes of the State of Washington. By an article in its constitution cities of 20,000 may create for themselves freehold charters, which need not be approved by the legislature; and by a law adopted in 1903 the local electorate, on petition of 15 per cent of the voters, may initiate amendments to the charter affecting local matters. Under this law Seattle and Everett, Wash., adopted the recall. By a further provision of the Washington general laws all cities of the second class may recall their aldermen on petition of three-fourths of the legal voters of those cities.

In California all cities of 3,500 population or more may create freeholders' charters, subject to the approval of the legislature, but it has been the custom of the legislature to approve practically all of these city charters. Amendments to such charters may be initiated by 15 per cent of the voters, which amendments, when approved by a vote of the people, must be submitted to the legislature. The amendments, like the charters, are in nearly every instance approved by the legislature. Thus all of the important California cities to-day have either the initiative and referendum or the recall, or all three of these means of direct legislation. In a sense Los Angeles was the pioneer of the recall cities of California, modeling its statutes after the recall law of the Canton Schaffhausen, in Switzerland. It provides for the recall of any elective officer by 25 per cent of the electors who are qualified for the election of a successor to the man to be recalled. Other California cities followed with modifications in the matter of percentage of voters required to force a recall election, as follows: San Diego, 25 per cent; San Bernardino, 51 per cent; Santa Monica, 40 per cent; Alameda, same as Los Angeles, except that it applies also to appointive officers; Long Beach, 40 per cent; San Francisco, 30 per cent; Riverside and Vallejo, 25 per cent. A number of California cities, including Sacramento and Eureka, have the initiative and referendum without the recall, while practically all of the above-mentioned cities which have the recall also have the initiative and referendum.

DALLAS ONE OF THE THREE.

In Texas the initiative, referendum, and recall has been granted by the legislature to three cities by special charters. The Dallas recall provision follows the general lines of the Los Angeles provision, except that in Dallas 35 per cent of the voters is required for a recall election. In Fort Worth the percentage is 20, while in Denison the recall on the application of 20 per cent of the legal voters applies only to the mayor and aldermen. By reason of Gov. Colquitt's veto the initiative, referendum, and recall charter of Texarkana failed.

This summary does not cover all of the direct legislation development in American cities, but it serves to show the extent to which these checks on representative government in municipalities have grown in the past decade. How intelligently it has been used in some communities is shown by the following instance from San Francisco, with a mixed, ring-ridden population of 416,912: On November 15 last San Francisco held a special election at which 38 proposed amendments to the city charter were voted upon. These amendments filled a 36-page pamphlet, and 45,000 voters, about 50 per cent of the electorate, participated in the election. As to the result the well-known weekly publication, the Nation, comments thus:

"Every voter had to discriminate and act separately on the 38 proposals. There were no party emblems to help him. Yet there is nothing in the result to indicate that the decision was not arrived at as carefully as it would have been had the amendments been submitted to a representative assembly. Eighteen of the amendments were carried and 20 were rejected. Practically all the so-called reform amendments were accepted. The franchise rights of the city were safeguarded by the passage of amendments forbidding a monopoly of subways and tunnels and permitting the city to recall a franchise whenever it decides to buy the property of the traction company. Business interests opposed the proposal for the initiative and the recall, and a hard campaign was made against the franchise amendments, but both were carried, although by closer votes than those on most of the other proposals. San Francisco may be boss ridden and union labeled, but apparently the voters know how to decide important public questions intelligently."

MACHINE-RULED CITIES.

How some of the larger cities obtained the recall and the initiative and referendum is an interesting chapter in the development of direct legislation in machine-ruled cities. Seattle is a typical instance. One of the first uses by Seattle of the initiative and referendum was to get a charter amendment for a recall. This was in 1906. It took 25 per cent of the legal voters to initiate a recall amendment to the city charter. The city administration, through its corporation counsel and city clerk, threw one obstacle after another in the way of the movement, and the courts had to be invoked. The supporters of the movement were compelled, through a technicality, to submit the petition for the recall amendment on two separate occasions to 25 per cent of the voters for signatures before they could get it on the ballot, and when it did get there finally the amendment was so worded that the word "recall" did not appear in it for the guidance of the voters. The amendment read as follows: "No. 8. An amendment to fix term of office." It carried by 8 to 1. Of the 17,708 men who voted at this election, which was also the mayoralty election, 10,583 voters located and voted on the amendment, and of this number 9,312 voted for and only 1,271 against it. At this same election an amendment to increase the salaries of the city officials was defeated by 1,000 votes.

POWER OF RECALL FEATURE.

In 1902 Los Angeles adopted the recall by a vote of 5 to 1, after an exciting campaign. It used this instrument of control once and threatened to use it again with interesting results. The Los Angeles official who was removed by the recall was an alderman, whose influence, it was thought, was too uniformly in favor of the corporations that were manipulating city matters through the city council. When an aldermanic ring voted to give a printing contract to a bidder who was $25,000 higher than the competing bidder, the people of Los Angeles undertook to make an example of that particular alderman. About 40 per cent of the voters in his ward signed a petition for recall and at the special recall election he was retired to private life by a vote of 1,837 to 1,083. His successor, it is said, fought the political machine and the corporations that dominated the machine for a time, but finally gave up the fight and settled down to a passive, innocuous course in the city council that brought upon him the criticism of those who put him in office. The opponents of direct legislation cite this as an instance of the uselessness of the recall, while the advocates of the system contend that it merely demonstrates that the recall alone can not accomplish that which can be better done by a combination of the initiative, referendum, and recall. The advocates of direct legislation in this connection point to another instance in the political history of Los Angeles as showing the moral effect of the recall. The instance is this: Subsequent to the recall of the alderman in question the city council, it is said, attempted to grant a street railway franchise reputed to be worth $1,000,000, without compensation to the city. A cry was raised and a movement was started to recall several of the aldermen, whereupon the proposed franchise ordinance was withdrawn. In 1903 Los Angeles obtained also the initiative and referendum.

BEGINNING ABOUT 1892.

Such is the movement for direct legislation in cities and States in this country. The agitation for it started in an effective way about 1892. After a long campaign Iowa, in 1897, led the way with a general law applying the referendum to all franchise grants. Nebraska followed the same year with a law that was designed to enable cities to introduce both the initiative and referendum. The next year South Dakota adopted a constitutional amendment for the initiative and referendum in State affairs. In 1902 Oregon adopted the system in a form that has become the pattern for other Commonwealths, and then in rapid succession followed the other States. Colorado and Arkansas were the last two States to adopt the initiative and referendum—Colorado by a vote of 89,141 to 28,698 and Arkansas by a vote of 91,363 to 39,680. The proposal is now before the people of California in the shape of a constitutional amendment, providing not only for the initiative and referendum, but also for the recall, applicable even to the judiciary.

Heretofore the question of direct legislation has been either a municipal or a State issue, but recent events have exalted it into practically a national question. These events center around the admission of the Territory of Arizona, with its constitution containing the initiative, referendum, and recall, applicable to all elective State officers. This would make the recall applicable to the judiciary as it exists in Oregon and as it is now before the people of California. Only one State has come into the Union with a constitution containing an initiative and referendum provision. That was Oklahoma, but it did not contain a recall provision. In the United States Senate the fiercest opposition developed among Republicans and some Democrats to the Arizona constitution because of its direct legislation feature, and more particularly because of the proposed application of the recall to all elective officers, which includes the judiciary. This opposition went to the extent that most of the Republicans and one Democrat, Senator BAILEY, of Texas, voted to keep out both Arizona and New Mexico because of the provision in the Arizona constitution, the question being upon a joint resolution to admit the two Territories.

The difference between the two constitutions is interesting. New Mexico's constitutional convention was controlled by Republicans, who did not insert either the initiative or the recall, but adopted a referendum to become effective on the petition "of not less than 25 per cent of the qualified electors in each judicial district of the State," a stipulation which, it is asserted, would make the referendum unworkable under existing political conditions in that Territory. The Arizona constitution provides for the initiative and referendum, the initiative on application of 15 per cent of the voters and the recall applicable to all elective officers. Other notable features of the Arizona constitution are the direct primary system, the advisory primary for United States Senators, nonpartisan elections for the judiciary, juvenile courts with the age of responsibility fixed at 18 years, physical valuation of railroads, abrogation of the fellow-servant doctrine in lawsuits, corporation commission with wide powers.

The Democratic position is that so long as a Territory offers a republican form of government Congress should admit it to statehood, and in the present extra session of Congress they will attempt to force the admission of Arizona as a State. It is the fight that will be made against such action that will probably bring the initiative, referendum, and recall to the front as a national issue, where heretofore it has existed only as a problem in local government.

This situation has produced a widespread interest in the subject of direct legislative agencies, and an interesting variety of views are being expressed upon it. It is with these views, as well as the question as it is now before the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case from Oregon, that the next article of this series will treat.

PROMINENT VIEWS ON DIRECT LEGISLATION—ATTITUDE OF BAILEY, TAFT, AND OTHERS ON INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL—OPINIONS VARY WIDELY—SOME FAVOR IDEA IN EXTREME FORM; OTHERS THINK IT SHOULD BE QUALIFIED AND LIMITED IN SCOPE.

This necessarily brief survey of the initiative, referendum, and recall in the countries where it has been put to a practical test—Switzerland and certain States of the American Union—would be lacking in an interesting and enlightening detail did it not set forth what some of the leading thinkers and leading politicians have to say upon the subject.

It may be well to set down at the beginning three views that have attracted wide attention—two of them radically different, and the third occupying a middle ground. One of these expressions is by Gov. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, indorsing the Oregon law, which is the most carefully devised system of initiative, referendum, and recall for State affairs in existence. The second is the contrary view of Senator JOSEPH W. BAILEY, of Texas, which denounces as "Populistic heresies" the initiative, referendum, and recall. The third is the middle-ground view of President William Howard Taft.

Immediately after his election to the governorship of New Jersey, Gov. Woodrow Wilson issued the following signed statement on this subject:

"I believe the Oregon system of popular-government laws has wrought a fundamental reform of previous corruption and has brought to the people of the State truly representative government. I believe the system which has been evolved there contains the essentials of a body of laws and constitutional amendments which the people of other States should carefully study with a view of procuring for themselves the manifest benefits which have been derived for the people of that State."

SENATOR BAILEY'S VIEWS.

In his telegram to Gov. Colquitt announcing the withdrawal of his resignation from the United States Senate Senator BAILEY says:

"You know how unalterably I am opposed to these Populistic heresies known as the initiative, referendum, and recall, and I would not be willing to remain in the service if a majority of the party friends associated with me were willing to give their approval to them. * * * I am willing to work to the limit of my strength so long as I can serve the public and at the same time obey what I understand to be the commandment of Democratic principles, but no office could tempt me for one moment to compromise with a policy which I am certain would in the end destroy the Government established by our fathers."

The views which President Taft holds as to the initiative, referendum, and recall, while known generally to his friends, have not been embodied by him in a speech or formal statement, and therefore can not be directly quoted. It is known that President Taft regards these instruments of direct legislation as largely experimental, and he finds no objection to municipalities trying them out, cautious and on a moderate scale. In larger matters he is not inclined to find fault with the referendum limited to such cases where the acts of one legislature would be binding on a succeeding legislature, as, for instance, in the granting of franchises, but he does not favor a general initiative and referendum as found in Oregon, where a great mass of voters is periodically called upon to exercise the fine discrimination that is exercised by a small body of legislators after thorough debate and study of the subjects before them for enactment into law.

President Taft is inclined to go a little further in the matter of the recall. He does not find serious objection to a recall, properly safeguarded, that is made applicable to administrative and legislative officials, but he stands unalterably opposed to the application of the recall to the judiciary.

ROOSEVELT FAVORS IDEA.

To these views may be added a fourth, that of former President Roosevelt, who gives a cautious indorsement of the initiative and referendum, coupled with an almost noncommittal observation about the recall; also a fifth view, that of Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts, which is frequently cited by the ultraconservative Republicans of the United States Senate as the last word in opposition to the clamor for more direct legislation by the people.

In his articles on Nationalism, in the Outlook, Col. Roosevelt says in regard to the initiative, referendum, and recall:

"As regards the initiative and referendum, I think that the anticipation of their adherents and the fears of their opponents are equally exaggerated. I believe that it would be a good thing to have the principle of the initiative and referendum applied in most of our States, always so safeguarded as to prevent its being used either wantonly or in a spirit of levity.

"As regards the recall, it is sometimes very useful, but it contains undoubted possibilities of mischief, and of course it is least necessary in the case of short-term elective officers."

OPPOSED BY SENATOR LODGE.

The views of Senator LODGE on the demand for more direct control over legislation are given in a speech delivered in Boston on September 15, 1907, and which, on motion of Senator Hale, of Maine, were embalmed in Senate document No. 114 of the first session of the Sixtieth Congress. Senator LODGE was discussing not a binding initiative, referendum, and recall proposal, but merely a public-opinion bill, such as they have in Illinois, which enables the people by direct vote only to record their sentiment on some submitted public question. In this speech, which is regarded as perhaps the strongest expression in opposition to the principle of direct legislation, Senator LODGE says:

"If you force the legislature to deal with certain measures under a mandate which practically compels them to vote upon these measures in only one way, you take from your representatives all responsibility and all power of action, and the representative principle in your government will atrophy and wither away, until it becomes in the body politic like some of those rudimentary organs in the natural body—quite useless and often a mere source of dangerous disease. This public-opinion bill does this very thing, for it aims directly at the destruction of representative responsibility, and I think, although it received the support of many excellent people, who did not pause to consider it carefully, that it found its origin among those small groups whose avowed purpose is to destroy our present institutions and forms of government and replace them with Socialism and anarchy."

PRESERVING REPRESENTATIVE FORM.

Another interesting view which Senator LODGE presents in that speech is as follows:

"I think the people are eminently capable of governing themselves by proper methods, and that their power should not be distorted and crippled by impossible devices. But the great fundamental objection to this bill is the destruction of the representative principle which it necessarily involves. The resort to the plebiscite is the favorite device of the usurper and savior of society. His opportunity comes when disorder, license, and wild legislation have driven the masses of men to a readiness to sacrifice liberty in the determination to have peace and order, a sad and desperate situation, familiar, unhappily, in the world's history. * * * What we want above all things is to preserve the representative bodies which have ever been the guardians of freedom and of popular liberties in this country."

Hardly less interesting than the study of the initiative, referendum, and recall, and its rapid application in recent years in State and municipal affairs in this country, is the study of the views of our leading public men on this subject. The first thing that appeals to the investigator is the meagerness of information on the part of most public men—not the thinkers, but the average leader in public affairs—as to the results, good or unsatisfactory, that have attended the practical application of these methods of legislative and administrative control. Most of these men are ready to rest their verdict on the deductions at which they arrive from a contemplation of how such a system would work out. Such a verdict is not based upon evidence or experience, and is apt to prove as faulty and defective as a system of government would be apt to prove that is worked out theoretically in great detail from a given principle, without the guidance of a practical test. Yet most public men have reached a conclusion that is either a sweeping indorsement or a sweeping denunciation of these instruments of government, based on a study of the theory, without a clear knowledge in detail as to exactly what the practical tests have developed in the way of good or bad results.

AS MEANS OF REFORM.

The next thing in the study of public opinion on this subject that strikes the investigator is that the political house cleaners seize upon the initiative, referendum and recall as the most effective means for remedying public evils and for holding politicians responsive to the public will—the initiative and referendum for State affairs and the recall for municipal matters. Three rather striking instances are found in the course assumed by former Gov. Folk in Missouri, Gov. Johnson in California, and the late Gov. John A. Johnson, of Minnesota. Each has spoken out eagerly in favor of more power to the people over their public servants as the most effective way of checking or eradicating the evils and abuses of representatives so strongly intrenched, politically speaking, that they feel safe in disregarding the public interests.

Thus Gov. Joseph W. Folk helped along the movement for more direct legislation in Missouri, which has culminated in the adoption of the initiative and referendum in State legislation by his attitude, which he stated thus:

"That the people have direct legislation reserved will do much to permanently end legislative corruption. There would be little use to bribe a legislator to defeat a measure if the people have the right to pass that measure over the head of the legislature. So it would be futile to bribe the legislature to pass a bill when the people have the power to veto it."

IN CALIFORNIA AND MINNESOTA.

Gov. Hiram Johnson, of California, seized upon the initiative, referendum, and recall as the most effective means of freeing the State from the powerful hold of the Southern Pacific Railway Co., that extended even to the courts, and one of the most far-reaching accomplishments of the recent political upheaval in California has been the incorporation in the California constitution of these three instruments of political control by the people over their representatives in office.

How the late Gov. John A. Johnson, of Minnesota, regarded the initiative and the referendum is set forth in one of his inaugural messages to the Minnesota Legislature as follows:

"There can be, I am sure, no valid reason against the submission to the people of a proposed constitutional amendment providing for a direct initiative and referendum. This would give the people an opportunity to vote on the question whether or not they want the right to instruct their representatives and also the further right to pass upon the laws enacted by their legislature. But whether you would care to go so far in this direction, I would urge your consideration of a plan for an advisory initiative and referendum."

WILSON'S RECOMMENDATION.

Whether any of these three reform governors just cited ever shared the opinions of Senator LODGE, or had reached an unfavorable opinion as to how the initiative, referendum, and recall would work out in practice is not disclosed in the range of study upon which this series of articles is based, but the investigation has developed a most interesting modification of the views of one reform governor who is now prominent in the public eye. But a few days ago Gov. Woodrow Wilson, whose indorsement of the Oregon State government plan has been quoted above, sent to the New Jersey Legislature a special message urging that New Jersey cities be given authority to establish for themselves commission form of government combined with the initiative, referendum, and recall.

"The reforms suggested for the adoption of the cities," Gov. Wilson tells the legislature, "do not consist merely in putting their government into the hands of a small commission. Back of this change and in addition to it are the initiative, referendum, and the recall, measures which enable the people to correct the mistakes of their governors, to adopt measures of their own initiative when necessary, and to recall from office unsatisfactory officials."

FORMER IDEAS CHANGED.

This is Gov. Wilson's view in facing a condition. His views, a few years back, in contemplating the subject as a theory, are given in an article recently published. In that article Dr. Wilson discussed two prime objections to the referendum: First, that it assumes a discriminating judgment and a fullness of information on the part of the people touching questions of public policy which they do not often possess; secondly, that it lowers the sense of responsibility on the part of the legislators. What Dr. Wilson thought then of the more creative initiative is perhaps found somewhere in his voluminous contributions to the thought of the day, and is probably as interesting as was his judgment on the referendum. The point in contrasting these two views is that since Gov. Wilson spoke of the referendum in such a dubious vein, the initiative, referendum, and recall have been put in operation in several States and numerous cities, and a study of the results obtained is perhaps responsible for the radical revision of his former verdict on the subject.

In view of the fact that the initiative, referendum, and recall are now occupying the attention of Congress in an incidental way, through the consideration of the constitution of the Territory of Arizona, three recent views expressed by intelligent Members of the House of Representatives are interesting. One of these is by Representative SIMS, of Tennessee, a Democrat; another is by Representative KENT, a progressive Republican of California; and the third is by Representative MCCALL, of Massachusetts, a so-called regular Republican and one of the most scholarly men in the House.

In offering an amendment providing for the application of the recall to United States Senators, Representative SIMS said:

"Revolution can nearly always be prevented if we will only yield to proper public sentiment, even in a conservative way. If you think that this kind of sentiment is going backward, you are mistaken. It is coming. Call it populistic or what you please, the doctrine of initiative, referendum, and recall is coming, and it is coming to stay. It is going to be a part of the national, State, and municipal legislation of this country; if not in the form now demanded, then in some way by which the same result will be reached."

APPLIED TO ARIZONA.

Discussing the Arizona constitution, Representative MCCALL deals only with the provision for the recall of the judges, in regard to which he says:

"I do not believe in the principle of the recall of the judges. The judge would no sooner be elected than he would be liable again to enter into a contest for his place. He would be compelled to argue his possibly complicated legal decision on an appeal to the voters. If he desired to retain his place, he could only do so by constantly deciding important cases not according to the law, but in a way that would conform to the prevailing popular passion. Believing that the recall of judges would be entirely subversive of the independence of the judiciary, and even of well-settled civil government, I am opposed to it."

Representative KENT of California takes this view:

"I am not afraid of the result of such power—the recall—being lodged in the people. I believe that our people are extremely patient and really conservative, and that the attempt to exercise the recall would at once create a sympathy for the person against whom the process is to be applied. I therefore believe that nothing but extremely unworthy conduct or a vitally antipublic attitude, and not a mere trivial difference of opinion, could be a cause for the removal of a judge."

The initiative, referendum, and recall have been tried before another tribunal than the bar of public opinion. It has been fought for and fought against most luminously in the courts of several States, and its final, constitutional test awaits it even now before the United States Supreme Court. The legal consideration of the question goes to the very fundamentals of our form of government. What light, within the understanding of the layman, the courts have been able to shed on the subject will be theme of the next of this series of articles.

GROUNDS FOR GREAT DEAL OF ARGUMENT—MANY LOOK TO SUPREME COURT'S DECISION AFFECTING DIRECT LEGISLATION—REPLETE WITH INTEREST—CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED IN INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL—RECENT CONTROVERSIES.

By way of bringing to a termination this series of articles on the initiative, referendum, and recall, it may be well to consider briefly the constitutional question involved in the subject.

This question, as raised in the leading cases that have been decided by the State courts and that is raised in the case from Oregon, the first one of its kind in the United States Supreme Court, hinges upon what is meant by the constitutional requirements of a republican form of government. The contention wages over whether the Constitution by "republican form of government" meant a government with power exclusive in the men elected to represent the people, or, in other words, pure representative government, and whether, in that event, the representatives can delegate back to the people for direct legislation any of this governmental power.

Early judicial decisions generally upheld the doctrine that the legislatures have no authority to redelegate to the people the power which is constitutionally vested in the legislatures, and therefore have no authority to refer to the people for adoption or rejection proposed general laws. Judicial citations on this point usually given are Thorne v. Cramer (1851, 15 Barb., N. Y., 112), Barto v. Himrod (1853, 8 N. Y., 483), People v. Collins (1854, 33 Mich., 343), State v. Copeland (1854, 3 R. I., 33), Santo v. State (1855, 2 Iowa, 165), and State v. Hayes (1881, 61 N. H., 264). For a contrary view, State v. Parker (1854, 26 Vt., 357) is cited.

REQUIREMENTS OF LAW.

Yet in nearly every State the constitution expressly requires ratification or rejection by the people of legislative acts on specified subjects, as, for instance, State boundaries, location of seat of government and State institutions, public debt and taxation, etc., while, as has been shown in the preceding articles of this series, some 12 States have adopted constitutional amendments, most of them for the initiative and referendum in general legislation, some for the referendum alone, and in one State—Oregon—the initiative, referendum, and recall in State and municipal government.

Whether such sweeping constitutional provisions, particularly the right of the people to initiate legislation, are in contravention of "republican form of government" is the question which is now squarely before the United States Supreme Court for final and conclusive determination in the Oregon case, which is to be heard and decided at the next term of the Supreme Court. The style of the Oregon case is Pacific States Telegraph & Telephone Co. v. State of Oregon. It grows out of an action brought by the State to recover from the telephone company 2 per cent of the gross receipts of the company for the year 1906. In that year the people of Oregon by an initiative petition adopted a law to tax corporations on their gross receipts. The Pacific States Telegraph & Telephone Co. resisted this payment upon several grounds, the principal one being "that the initiative and referendum amendment to the constitution, under which the act of 1906 was proposed and adopted, is unconstitutional and void," because it is repugnant to certain cited sections of the Federal Constitution and to the Oregon enabling act. Other issues were raised by the telephone company, such as that the act fixing the tax was never approved by the governor nor submitted to him for approval; that the tax is not equal and uniform, as the company is already taxed under an act by the legislature of 1903 for its franchise to do business, etc. The trial and appellate court sustained the State in all points, and the Oregon supreme court affirmed the judgment of the lower courts. In its decision, by Justice Bean, the Oregon supreme court passes on the question of the constitutionality of the Oregon initiative and referendum as follows:

DIRECT AND INDIRECT POWER.

"Whether the initiative and referendum amendment to the constitution is invalid because repugnant to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States was thoroughly argued to and considered by this court in Kadderly v. Portland, and the views of the court as then entertained are indicated in the opinion filed in that case, and it is needless to restate them at this time."

In the case of Kadderly v. Portland (44 Oreg., 118) the Oregon supreme court, taking the view of Madison in the Federalist, 302, that by republican form of government is meant a form of government opposed to monarchy or aristocracy, and which "derives all its power directly or indirectly from the great body of the people and is administered by persons holding office during pleasure, for a limited period or during good behavior," finds as follows:

"The initiative and referendum amendment does not abolish nor destroy the republican form of government or substitute another in its place. The representative character of the government still remains. * * * Under this amendment, it is true, the people may exercise a legislative power, and may, in effect, veto bills passed and approved by the legislature and the governor, but the legislative and executive departments are not destroyed. * * * Laws proposed and enacted by the people under the initiative laws of the amendment are subject to the same constitutional limitations as other statutes and may be amended or repealed by the legislature at will."

No briefs have been filed as yet in the Pacific States Telegraph & Telephone Co. case in the United States Supreme Court, but in the presentation of its case against the initiative and referendum before the Oregon supreme court this contention was set up by the company:

"The initiative is in contravention of the guaranty of a republican form of government. (U. S. Constitution, Art. IV., sec. 4.) Government by the people directly is the attribute of a pure democracy and is subversive of the principles upon which the Republic is founded. Direct legislation is, therefore, inconsistent with the form of State government which, upon the creation of the Union, the people of the States reserved the right to adopt and repugnant to that form of government with which alone Congress could admit a State to the Union.

"The question is submitted with confidence that the courts of the country will protect the people in the enjoyment of those constitutional checks and safeguards against their own power which, with wisdom and deliberation, they created for themselves. Injustice and misrule have characterized all unconstitutional democracies and all popular governments administered in accordance with the whims and caprices of the multitude."

It was further contended that the initiative and referendum is "contrary to and in violation of the implied provision of the Constitution of the United States, that the government of the several States shall be representative in form and that the several States shall create and maintain legislative assembles." The citations for these implied provisions are sections 2, 3, 4, and 6, Article I; sections 3 and 4, Article IV, of the United States Constitution; section 1 of the fourteenth amendment, and also the provisions of the Oregon enabling act.

It is contended that if the people can override the legislatures through the initiative and referendum the legislatures can not do those things, as, for instance, the prescribing of the time and manner of holding elections for Congressmen, concurrence in the purchase by the Federal Government of military sites, etc., which the Federal Constitution leaves to the discretion of the legislatures.

In this case, which is now before the Federal Supreme Court, the constitutionality of the initiative and referendum was defended on these grounds:

DEFINITION OF "REPUBLICAN."

That the word "republican" has a broad and general meaning, indicating self-government, or popular government, as opposed to monarchy or aristocracy.

That the right of direct legislation has been universally recognized and approved by the State governments and by all departments of the National Government in the matter of the fundamental laws of the different States, in the matter of local legislation as affecting portions of the State, and in the matter of general legislation upon particular subjects wherein the people in their State constitutions saw fit to reserve that power.

That the courts now generally hold that view.

When this case comes before the Supreme Court next term it will be followed with keenest interest by people in all of the States, but it will be of especial interest to the 12,653,645 people of Arkansas, California, Colorado, Maine, Missouri, Montana, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, and South Dakota, who have both the initiative and referendum in State legislation, and to the people of Nevada, who for some years have been applying a general State-wide referendum to their State legislation. The decision will also be awaited with interest by hundreds of cities in the United States where these agencies of direct legislation have been established.

To those who would follow up this interesting subject of their own accord, a brief statement of sources of information should prove of service. First, it may be stated that no one work has brought the development of direct legislation, with its recent rapid extension to cities, down to date; nor, so far as its extension to State governments is concerned, is there any single work or article that has brought the subject down to as recent a period as has been done in this series of articles.

GIVE SUBJECT SPECIAL STUDY.

There are two organizations in this country that are devoted to presenting arguments and literature on this subject, one in favor of and the other against direct legislation. The former is the Initiative and Referendum League of America, George H. Shibley, president, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C. The opposing organiation is the Representative Government League, W. D. McKinney, secretary, Columbus, Ohio.

Two United States Senators, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr., of Oregon, and ROBERT L. OWEN, of Oklahoma, have made the initiative, referendum, recall, short ballot, and other agencies for political reform a special study, and have had much direct legislation literature reproduced in the form of Senate documents which they will send out on request under their congressional franks. In addition to these sources, there are several magazines given up in greater or less degree to the advancement of direct legislation, the one following the subject in greatest detail being the quarterly publication called Equity Series, published in Philadelphia. A recent important contribution that has been made on this question is an extended legal analysis by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 20, 1911. A complete bibliography of the initiative, referendum, and recall is in course of preparation by the Library of Congress and will shortly be available through application to Members of Congress.

THE INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL.

With the article which it prints elsewhere to-day, dealing with the legal or constitutional phase of the matter, the series of articles which the News has been running from the pen of its Washington correspondent on the subject of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall is brought to an end. It was the purpose of the News, in printing these articles, to throw an uncolored light on a subject that was manifestly in need of illumination of that kind. They have excited a great deal of discussion in Texas, mostly academic, since there was no pending issue that involved the question of their adoption, and this discussion has disclosed less knowledge than lack of knowledge. The News believes that these articles have served their purpose excellently. It would not be possible, of course, to exhaust a subject of that depth and breadth in five articles, limited each to such space as a newspaper can afford to give to a single topic, but they must have supplied a working basis for such as care to make a thorough study of the subject and somewhat rectified the preconceived notions of those whose opinions as to the virtue of these devices were woven out of their predilections or prejudices only.

The News feels that in printing this series of articles it has performed something of a public service, for it must be obvious to most men, regardless of their individual dispositions, that sooner or later we in Texas shall have to deal with this issue in a definitive way. It is, then, in the highest degree important that the judgment that the people of Texas will make should be based on facts rather than fancies; that they should know what the experience of other people has shown to be virtues and the evils of these devices of government. The desire of the people for a larger control of their political affairs is a legitimate ambition, even when they are not impelled to it by the necessity of wresting control from corrupt politicians. Children grown to be men are not content with the restraints and repressions which chafed them not at all as children. Societies are subject to this same law of life, so that the swelling demand for a more direct control of political affairs must in a republic seem to be the result of a purely evolutionary process.

These articles have brought several important facts into clear view. The most important of them, it seems to us, is that whatever the present status of the initiative and referendum, both in this country and in Europe, it has been evolved of natural causes and has been attained by slow process. That is particularly true of Switzerland, where, as if by natural consequence of democratic government, these devices of government first made their appearance. There, the referendum was evolved first, and it came in a single canton as the result of a particularly obnoxious railroad grant. The initiative came afterwards, and both were adopted cautiously, first by cantons and then by the nation. They were not the patented prescription of some theorist, but rough tools forged by experience to handle situations for which there was apparently no satisfactory management with the instruments that had been in use. If, then, that which is born of the travail of necessity has a validity and vitality which is not to be credited to the thing that is spun merely by the imagination, then the initiative and referendum have a parentage that entitles them to at least a respectful consideration.

In the recital of their operation in Switzerland there was much that challenges the arguments of both the advocates and the opponents of these devices of government. For example, it appears that not more than half the people of Switzerland usually participate in initiative and referendum elections. This fact seems to refute the point urged by their advocates that the exercise of direct legislative power by the people must necessarily excite in them a livelier interest in public matters and induce a keener study of political questions. Students of the working of the initiative and referendum in Switzerland have suggested, as an explanation of this rather anomalous circumstance, that it signifies, not a lack of interest in the questions submitted to the voters, but rather a disposition on the part of the average voter to refrain from voting when either he does not understand or is in doubt as to the merits of the question to be determined. That the crowd, meaning thereby the great mass of the people, is strongly inclined by instinct to conservatism, more prone to accommodate itself to the existing order than to undergo the pains of readjustment, is asserted by psychology, proved by history, and is, indeed, verified by common observation among ourselves. The suggestion, therefore, that the rather large abstention from voting in Switzerland is due, not to lack of interest, but to doubt and uncertainty, is in perfect accord with the fact that the popular impulse is conservative.

Another fact disclosed as to the working of the initiative and referendum in Switzerland is that initiative and referendum elections are by no means common, a circumstance that rather supports the argument that the possession of this power by the people tends to make the use of it unnecessary, because of a greater readiness on the part of legislative bodies to respond to the wish of public opinion. This notion is further confirmed by the fact that during 20 years only one-sixth of the laws made in Switzerland were initiated by the people, and that only one-sixth of the laws originating in the Federal assembly have been challenged or submitted to a referendum vote. It is a very notable circumstance, too, that, having the initiative and referendum, the Swiss seem to have concluded that the recall is unnecessary.

But a frequent objection is that the initiative and referendum are exotics with us, and that the experience which the Swiss have had with them has very little didactic value for us. As to the lesson which the experience of one people has for another, that would be a sufficient theme of itself; we shall merely remark that if the initiative and referendum are exotics with us, they seem to have found an environment exceedingly favorable to their propagation. It was shown that the initiative and referendum, applicable to both constitutional amendments and State laws, are in operation in Arkansas, Missouri, North Dakota, Oklahoma, and Oregon, and are available to nearly 8,000,000 people; and that the initiative and referendum, as applicable to State laws but not to constitutional amendments, are in operation in Maine, Montana, and South Dakota, and available in those three States to more than a million and a half people. The power to initiate and pass on laws is exercised, in other words, by about 9,000,000 people in this country, so that if these devices of government are of alien birth they have pretty far undergone the process of naturalization. It ought to be said that these figures do not take account of the advisory initiative and referendum in Illinois, nor of the party initiative in Texas.

In this country the initiative and referendum were first espoused by the people of South Dakota, but it remained for the people of Oregon not only to give the most absolute application, but to devise particular features designed to make them more workable. The severest test to which these devices were ever subjected was probably last year, when the people of Oregon at one time passed judgment on 32 measures, as diverse in their subject matter as they were numerous. And it is a remarkable fact, of which the advocates of these devices can not fail to make much note, that of the 32 measures submitted to the people all but 9 were rejected.

In all discussion of the subject of direct legislation the initiative and referendum are usually linked, as if they were but two phases of the same thing, while, as a matter of fact, they are distinct entities. The referendum, as we have said, or, rather, the adoption of it, preceded the adoption of the initiative in Switzerland; and in Nevada the people have the referendum without the initiative. But in all other States in this country one has been taken with the other. Nevertheless, they are not parts of the same thing, nor even twins. One can be, and is, used independently of the other. They are not of equal merit, and an argument could be made for one which would give very little support to the other. Our Washington correspondent, in his articles, cited a very notable instance of this fact by quoting from an article recently written by Prof. Lowell for the Atlantic Monthly on the working of the initiative and referendum in Oregon. Prof. Lowell, while inclining palpably to favor the referendum, pronounced against the initiative, on the ground that with the people free to propose laws the statute books would become a hodgepodge of conflicting enactments.

This seems to be a valid and cogent criticism, although it could hardly be contended that statute books which legislatures have made are remarkable for the harmonious coordination of their several chapters. But of course the sovereign answer to all these criticisms is that, like everything that is new, the initiative and referendum will be subject to no final judgment as to their worth until they shall have undergone the test of experience. Our Federal Constitution was subjected to a good deal of tinkering before it became measurably satisfactory. The greater part of it as it exists to-day was added by way of amendment, suggested by experience, and it is to that test that the initiative and referendum will be subjected; and it is by that test that they will be judged. If they withstand that test, they will become fixed principles of our Government, despite all the theorizing and argument that can be brought to bear against them; and if they do not withstand that test, they will be rejected finally, despite all the theorizing and argument that can be invented in their behalf. So far the progress which these ideas have made prove them to be an evolutionary process. If they come of that legitimate and irresistible cause, it would be fatuous to oppose them. The utmost that wisdom should attempt is to demand that they shall prove themselves at every step of their progress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this resolution for the admission of these two Territories as States it seems to me we ought to draw a distinction between the making of a constitution, by representatives, for a people who must live under it and the approval of a constitution by Representatives who will not live under it. As I look at it, our duty here is to ascertain whether these constitutions are republican in form and whether they conflict with the Constitution of the United States. If they are republican in form, and if they do not conflict with the Constitution of the United States, we ought, as Members of this Congress, to approve those constitutions, even though we do not agree with all of the stipulations that are contained in them. If I were a member of a body that was making a constitution for Arizona and New Mexico there are things in both these constitutions that I would oppose, and there are other things, not in them, that I would include.

But it has not been seriously contended here by any man that these constitutions are not republican in form or that they conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and it seems to me that it is our duty to approve them, as long as they are in accordance with the wishes of the people who must live under them and having been made by direct representatives of those people.

Mr. Chairman, I am a believer in the initiative and the referendum, and also in the recall, and yet I have never believed that the recall ought to apply to the judiciary. From the very nature of things the judge is called upon often to protect the minority against the majority. I believe the experiment is coupled with danger, and yet after listening to several days of this debate, indulged in by eminent attorneys who are Members of this House, I have come to the conclusion that we are overcautious in regard to this particular objection and that many of the objections that have been urged to this particular kind of recall against the judiciary are not entitled to all the consideration that they were intended to have by those who made them. I believe the conditions that have been imagined here by those who have opposed this recall are exaggerated and that they will never occur, at least not in the flagrant forms in which they were presented here.

It seems to me that we can account for the feeling of attorneys who during all their lives have lived in an atmosphere of profound respect for the judiciary. I share in that belief, and I believe we are overcautious, perhaps, as attorneys, men whose profession and livelihood have led them all along one line of great admiration and respect for the judiciary and the imputation to the judiciary of almost a quality of infallibility.

It has been said by those who have opposed the initiative and referendum that if it had existed Washington would have been recalled. Mr. Chairman, I deny it. Washington was reelected after four years of service by practically a unanimous vote. He would have been elected again for a third term by a grateful and patriotic people had he consented longer to serve his country as President. It is said that Abraham Lincoln would have been recalled. I do not believe it. Mr. Chairman, Abraham Lincoln was elected again in the midst of his term of office by a majority so strong that it left no doubt but that the people approved of his action and were anxious and willing that he should continue in office. It has been said by those who have opposed the initiative and referendum that President Roosevelt would have been recalled had that particular power been in existence when he was President. And yet it is common knowledge to all men that President Roosevelt, in order to escape nomination and overwhelming reelection for a third term, had positively and unequivocally to decline. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been argued that the people are not sufficiently well posted to pass upon matters that may be submitted to them under the initiative and referendum. It has been argued that representatives in the legislature are better qualified to pass upon the law that they should give to the people than the people are themselves; and yet as a rule all the members of the legislature go back to the people for reelection, and always claim this honor upon their record. Take as an illustration Members of this Congress who go back to their people for reelection—ask for a reelection upon the record made here. That record consists of their votes for and against various measures that come before this House, and they go before their people and ask approval of their conduct. If the people can not understand the meaning of their votes for and against the various bills and propositions that come before us, then how can they intelligently pass upon the qualifications of a Member for reelection? If they understand the Member's record—and they do, and we all know it—then they must know, they must understand, the bills and the measures and the laws that have come before the legislative body for passage or rejection. And if they understand them, why can they not just as well and just as intelligently vote directly upon the measures themselves as they can vote for the reelection or defeat of the man who has made the record?

It has been contended here that they will make mistakes. There is not any doubt but that they will. We never will have a form of government or system of control but what mistakes will be made in connection with it. Everything human is occasionally wrong. Every human being lacks perfection.

But I want to contend that if the initiative and referendum is given to the people it will increase their intelligence, it will increase their understanding, and it will increase their responsibility. When you increase the responsibility of a man, honest and patriotic—and a majority of the people are both honest and patriotic—when you increase a man's responsibility, then you increase his interest, you increase the care he is going to exercise in carrying out that responsibility.

It has been assumed by those men who have opposed the recall that the people are always going to vote wrong; that they are going to go wrong on the recall. It seems to me that that is a weakness in the argument that is its own sufficient answer. If responsibility is increased by giving the people additional power, they will rise equal to the emergency, and become, if it is necessary, more intelligent, and will take a greater interest, if it is necessary, in the affairs of government. [Applause.] And, rest assured, they will meet the responsibility with no more liability to err and go wrong than the representatives themselves. This demand for the initiative and referendum and recall has come about because of the dissatisfaction with conditions that have existed in the past. Great corporations and combinations of wealth have had too much influence in legislative affairs. Political machines by the use of money and political bosses by the control of patronage have controlled legislatures and brought about the enactment of laws detrimental to the public welfare and contrary to the direct will of the people. These influences have elected United States Senators, controlled the nomination and election of Members of the House of Representatives, and in some instances have placed the judicial ermine upon unworthy shoulders. By the use of money and political pie legislatures have been corrupted, bad laws enacted, and the rights of the common citizen disregarded and nullified.

The political machine and the political boss under our present system are the greatest enemies to the progress of humanity and the welfare of the country. The initiative and referendum will put them both out of business. It will give the people the right, whenever they choose to exercise it, to rectify any of the omissions, the wrongs, or the evils of the legislature. It will permit every citizen to have a direct voice in the enactment of laws under which all of the people must live. The existence of the right will act as a check and prevent bad legislation. It will not be abused or exercised to the injury or detriment of society. It simply puts into the hands of the people the right to enact laws for their own government and control. It is foolish to think they would try to use this right to their own injury and detriment.

As every man who has spoken, even those who have argued against this proposition of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, has admitted, there have been instances of frequent occurrence throughout the country in State and National Legislatures where the expressed will of the people has failed, because of a failure of their representatives to redeem the pledges and promises they have made and to be true to the platforms on which they were elected. It is because of this failure that this demand has come about for a greater participation in the affairs of the government by the people themselves. And if it is a government by the people, as every man will admit, if the consent of the governed is necessary, as the Declaration of Independence asserts it is, then why has any man the right to say, if a demand on the part of the people comes for the right of greater participation in the affairs of the government, that it should be denied? If it is their government, if it is their consent that is necessary in order to perpetuate it, and they want to take a direct hand in the government themselves, why should they not have the privilege? If they make mistakes, the responsibility will rest upon their own shoulders, and they will have the right, the opportunity, and the will to rectify them.

The recall, against which so much has been said, is not intended by those who favor it to be an everyday occurrence. It is not expected that this extraordinary remedy will be put into operation every day, every month, or every year. If it is in the constitution of a State, it will not be necessary, from its very presence there, to be often used. It will be like the policeman on the corner. So long as he is there there will be no danger of a robbery of the store on the corner. The very fact that the recall is placed in the constitution will of itself have a healthy, a patriotic, and a well-defined effect upon the members of the legislature and other elective officers. We can not afford, either as Members of Congress or as citizens of any of our States, it seems to me, to deny the right or privilege of any people to take into their hands as great a portion of the responsibility of government as they see fit by the exercise of the elective franchise to demand. [Applause.] The people can be trusted to do the right and patriotic thing. We have been regaled with all kinds of improbable, if not impossible, contingencies, under which, it is claimed, officials will be recalled. We have had the recall in some States for several years, and, as far as I am informed, no attempt even has been made to recall a State or even a county official. There is no danger that such an attempt would be made, except in cases of the most flagrant disregard of public duty. It is intended by its advocates for application only in such cases. If by any contingency, however, sufficient signatures could be obtained to apply the recall, without a good and sufficient reason, you can rest assured that the patriotic American voter, moved by his sense of justice and fair play, would rise up in his might and give to the upright official such an overwhelming indorsement as would be the most gratifying and satisfactory compliment that could come to an honest official who has done his patriotic duty. It has been said here that these reforms are favored by designing politicians only. I question no man's motive on either side of the question. There may be those whose motives are not pure on both sides, but the professional politician is against any reform or any change. It stands him in hand to be against this change, because it takes away his occupation and starts him out into the cold world with no visible means of support.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is the gentleman in favor of the minority report, which says that the people of Arizona must vote the recall of the judiciary out of their constitution?

Mr. NORRIS. No, sir; I am not. I expect to vote for the majority report. [Applause.] I thought I made myself plain at the beginning; that while personally I had some fear and doubt, and if it were a proposition put up to me to vote one way or the other in my own State or any other place where I or the people whom I represent was to be governed by the constitution, I should vote against that proposition, yet, as I explained awhile ago, I do not believe that to be my duty here. But in the majority report that particular proposition is submitted again to the people of Arizona. I think it is wise to submit it again, because, as it has been said, and I think with a good deal of reason, the people of these Territories have been clamoring for years for admission as States, and were, perhaps, inclined to vote for almost any provision in the constitution in order to be admitted, and it may be that there are some stipulations in this constitution that, standing alone, by a straight referendum vote on some particular proposition they might reject. This report gives them the opportunity to do that. If they vote in favor of it, I am in favor of permitting them to have it, and believe that they ought to have the right to have it if they want it, and the majority report puts it up squarely to them as to whether they want it or not. And I believe that if the experiment is tried, we will find at least that the objections are not so serious as many of us have thought they possibly were.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that as to any other proposition in the constitution of either one of these States that, standing alone, as a separate proposition, there would be any doubt about, it would be wise to give the people of those Territories the opportunity to vote directly upon that proposition. But after their constitutions are adopted they will have the right to do that, and perhaps, if there be any evil in either one of those constitutions, in their own time and in their own way they will extricate themselves from the difficulty.

As far as we are concerned, we ought to give them the fullest opportunity to do it. They have expressed themselves on these two constitutions and have, by a large majority in each instance, voted to approve them; and with the safeguard in regard to the two particular provisions, one in New Mexico and one in Arizona, about which there seems to be some doubt, it seems to me we are doing exactly the right thing to give them an opportunity to express themselves again on those two particular propositions. And when they have done it, Mr. Chairman, then we ought to be perfectly satisfied with the result, whether the constitution in all particulars agrees with our ideas or whether it does not.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the tendency toward initiative and referendum is going to result in more good to the people of the several States that have been putting it into their constitutions, and others that I think will soon follow, than any other one particular item in any constitution or in any law. It will be placing within the hands of the people the largest possible amount of participation in Government affairs. It will give to them rights that can now only be exercised in an indirect way, and I do not fear but what they will rise to the responsibility that this new duty and this new privilege places upon them. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. FERRIS, and Mr. ANDREWS were given leave to extend remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia, in charge of the time on that side, if he expects to ask the House to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do; yes.

Mr. MANN. And may I ask how late the committee will continue in session this evening?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like to run along until 6 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania in the chair). To whom does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, while discussing the resolution before this House for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union, I shall esteem it a favor if you will not interrupt me until I have finished, as my time has been limited to 30 minutes. After I have concluded, if my time has not expired, I will be glad to entertain a question from any of you.

In the creation of man nature has surrounded his being with certain fixed and unalterable conditions, which are primary in their character and which are coextensive with his existence, among which are air, light, water, food, and space. Destroy any of these and human life at once becomes extinct. While it is impossible to conceive of matter without space, yet it is just as impossible for man to live without air, light, water, and food.

Air and light are gifts from Heaven, and come to us freely. Water is found in abundance, and in such a pure condition that it requires but little exertion on our part to supply our daily wants, but the adequate supply of wholesome food is a different proposition. In all ages it has given mankind the greatest concern, and when coupled with our demand for raiment and shelter, at the very threshold of life, we find that nature has entailed upon us a servitude to ourselves of the most urgent and responsible character. A servitude upon which life itself depends.

In obedience to the same law of nature the herbivorous animal wanders all day long in search of food and drink, each depending upon its own activity for a sufficiency, and when night comes it lies down upon the bosom of mother earth contented for repose. At the dawn of the next day it eagerly enters upon the same monotonous task—day in and day out, the year round—with no other law to obey and with no other mission to fill it labors industriously without complaint and without tiring. No superiors to command; no masters to drive. All upon the same level, following the same instinct—the preservation of animal life.

A wonderful lesson is taught in the simple and harmless habits of this animal. The lesson of perfect equality; no preemption of territory, no corner on the supply of food, however small it may become; all are given an equal chance in the race for life.

How different it is with man. His physical wants are much more complex. The limitation which is placed upon the natural supply of his food products and the crude and unwholesome state in which he receives them from the hand of nature, has forced him to open up and extend a mighty industry—the cultivation of the soil. Out of this industry, by force of necessity, sprang a new and independent business—the production of implements, tools, vehicles, and machinery—by the assistance of which the farmer might be able to take from the lap of nature annually the fullness of her richest and most bountiful gift.

This gave birth to the workshop and created a demand for new materials, which drove the workman to the forest for lumber and to the mine for iron and steel. Coupled with our demand for structural material for shelter, these two industries have grown to such proportions that the blacksmith now manages the modern steel plant and the carpenter directs the progress of a wonderful lumber industry.

Raiment for our bodies is no less exacting upon our energy and activity. At first the bark from the tree and the grass from the marshes furnished our ancestors with materials for clothing, but they have long since been superseded by the broad acres of flax and cotton, large herds of sheep and goats, and the fruitful product of the busy silkworm. The housewife has no longer any use for the hand cards, the spinning wheel, and the family loom—the cotton and woolen mills do the work for all.

The wooden sandal has been placed in the museum as a relic by the industrious tannery and the mammoth boot and shoe factory.

The necessity for collecting the crude material in centers to be converted into the finished product, and the further necessity of the proper distribution of the finished product among the people for daily use and daily consumption, created the demand for a new and distinct business of great activity and labor. First we had the pack animal climbing mountains and crossing deserts and the galley slave tugging at the oar of rowboats; then followed the invention of steam; and now we have master ships of wonderful capacity crossing the high seas and loaded trains flying across the country at lightning speed.

While it is true that our demands for intellectual and moral culture have given us the public school and the university, charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions, the Sunday school and the church, and other kindred institutions, calling for more or less manual labor, yet the great industrial and commercial enterprises of modern civilization had their origin in the supreme law of nature, which entailed upon us the responsibility of supplying ourselves with food, raiment, and shelter, and upon this responsibility these vast institutions are founded and must depend for their future support, maintenance, and development. This by far is the greatest field for physical labor—a labor which must be performed by us and from which we can not escape, however much we may so desire—and in the performance of which we are carrying out the same instinct of nature as that of the animal on the plain in search of food—the instinct of the preservation of animal life. In my opinion, God intended that every man should bear his just share of these burdens. Is this true? Let us see.

Were the mission of man in this life fulfilled by the supply of our temporal wants, the answer to this question might be less difficult, but as man by nature is both a social and progressive being and as his greatest happiness is not found in satisfying his physical appetite, but in the culture and development of the finer qualities of his mind and soul, we find ourselves confronted with a new field of labor more extensive in its scope and claimed to be by far more important to our temporal and spiritual welfare. Upon this culture our beautiful civilization is founded, and upon its purity and the extent of its future development hangs the destiny of nations.

Thus we find two vast fields of labor spread out before us, in which all mankind are required by the decree of nature to enter and labor.

Physical labor being the most burdensome, it is the most dreaded, and from the earliest history of man we find certain men seeking to avoid it. At the beginning the physical strong—the men—reveled in idleness or amused themselves in the chase, while they forced the weak—the women and children—to cultivate the soil and make the living.

In the primitive formation of government whole communities met on the plains and elected the tallest of their number as their leader. Time and experience gave these leaders a taste for power, luxury, and ease. They picked quarrels with neighboring tribes, and by deception and false promises of reward they organized armies for conquest, and after subduing and capturing weaker and unsuspecting neighboring communities they divided the spoils among their generals, created a feudal system of land tenure, and subjugated their captives—men, women, and children—to a condition of abject physical servitude. They created titles of honors, forced labor to build castles for defense, molded crowns for the head of arbitrary power, and boldly proclaimed to the world the false and damnable doctrine that the right to rule was divine and that kings could do no wrong. They surrounded royalty with large standing armies to enforce cruel decrees for taxation and punishment.

They kept the masses in ignorance, tied them to the wheel of toil, and appropriated the fruits of their labor to create rich dynasties. For long centuries only the few, the rich, were permitted to enter schools of intellectual culture and to participate in the administration of government.

They reveled in ease and luxury, while the poor, helpless masses, driven by whips of cruel masters, were forced to assume the entire burden of physical labor, with no opportunity for mental or moral culture. This was not nature's decree.

To explode this unholy theory of government, and to relieve the people from its baneful and blighting influence, we are told that it has cost the world the lives of 1,500,000,000 soldiers and the expenditure of $40,000,000,000 of wealth. But the light of civilization, directed by the Divine hand of Providence, has led the people out from under the cruel hand of imperial power, as Moses led the children of Israel out from under the bondage of their cruel Egyptian masters. But in doing so, the people, like the children of Israel, have been compelled to wade through red seas—not of water, but of blood.

It was the plain, common people of Europe, acting under the inspiration of love and longing for religious and political liberty, who deserted their homes, kindred, and loved ones in a land of arbitrary rule and paddled their way across the stormy Atlantic in search of a peaceful home in the bosom of nature—to the shores of beautiful America they drifted. Here they established a brotherhood, based upon nature's law of equality and simplicity. They separated the church from the state and carved out a stable government, deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed. [Applause.]

Under this form of government the plain, common people have steadily marched onward from the little log hut by the seaside to populous cities, whose clustered spires and stately edifices kiss the skies. By their labor they have converted the dense forests into beautiful farms and made the deserts blossom with roses. They have connected useful water courses by canals and constructed across the continent a perfect system of railroads. They have stretched the electrical wire from sea to sea and from lake to gulf, so that the man in his distant hut at the crossroads can talk with the merchant in the large cities a thousand miles away. The strong arm of labor has reached down into the bosom of the earth and brought to the surface hidden wealth in quantities sufficient to plaster the dwelling house of every citizen of this lovely land with silver and gold. At the bidding of persistent labor last year the mines of America yielded a treasure worth $2,000,000,000, and the farm surrendered products valued at $8,926,000,000, aggregating a total of nearly $11,000,000,000 in one year.

And now, in the morning of the twentieth century, these same common people present to the world for its candid inspection the product of their labor—a country of more than 3,000,000 square miles—the richest the blessed sun ever shone upon, teeming with a population of more than 92,000,000 of the best people of the best thought; a country with a government without an equal, with a civilization without a rival. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, when I sit here in this beautiful historic Capitol, in the shadow of that splendid monument erected within the corporate limits of this Capital City in honor of the Father of his Country, and hear gentlemen on the floor of this Chamber, gentlemen who directly represent more than 200,000 American freemen, the common people, and who indirectly represent more than 92,000,000 of the same common people, and while discussing the merits of this interesting resolution, utter language of distrust in their constituents, the common people, and charge that limited power left in their hands to correct abusive legislation is dangerous to stable government, and that these people with such power in their hands become a dangerous mob, I become restless in my seat and grow weary of life. [Laughter and applause.] When did the common people become a howling mob, with a rope in its hands for the neck of civilization? You show me a mob of the common people and I will show you a bastile to be pulled down. [Applause.]

It was this same mob that you are here denouncing who met old King John on the banks of the Runnymede on the 15th day of June, 1215, and forced him to sign the Magna Charta which gave to the people the writ of habeas corpus and the right of trial by jury. [Applause.] For centuries in England innocent men had been arrested upon false charges, cast in dungeons to languish, starve, and die, without even a hope for a trial. It was the crystallized public opinion of the common people in 1688 which forced King James II to abdicate the throne and make room for William of Orange, a more liberal King, who granted to the people the Bill of Rights, the substance of which has been copied in the constitutions of every State of the Union. [Applause.] While the people elected the members of the House of Commons, yet the Crown had created a large number of small boroughs, over which the "House of Tudor" had absolute control, for the purpose of giving to the King a majority in that great deliberative body, thereby depriving the people of their right to representative government.

Was the destruction of these "rotten boroughs" in order to restore to the people their rights under the English constitution the act of the criminal mob? Was the opening of the door to star-chamber courts in order to release innocent men from foul prisons the act of the criminal mob? No. It was the hand of destiny. You must not confound the criminal with the mob, for the criminal acts under cover and lies in wait for the blood of his victim and then seeks to hide from the public his hellish deed, while the mob rises up in its might, proclaims to the world its mission, and boldly marches forward without fear of danger. The man who secretly arms himself, boards the train, and holds up the helpless passenger for his money is the criminal. The force that rises up and in one night, pulls down imperial temples of force and murder, and the next day establishes instead thereof a beautiful republican form of government, deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, is the mob. [Applause.]

Remember, a grievance always precedes the mob, and without a grievance to redress, there is no mob. The Sons of Liberty had their grievance in taxation without representation before the Boston Tea Party emptied shiploads of English tea into Boston Harbor. The signers of the Declaration of Independence were the conspirators of the mob and the Revolutionary heroes were the real mob, who rescued from the hands of the selfish few the right to govern and placed it where it justly belongs, in the hands of the intelligent many.

The foul rape of Lucrece ended in the death of the cruel Tarquin, and the burning flames lighted by the torch in the hand of profligate power to destroy life and property in the city of ancient Rome revealed to the people the hiding place of Nero the tyrant. [Applause.]

Greatness rarely comes from the mansions of the idle rich. It springs more readily from the ranks of the honest, sturdy poor. Webster was a poor country boy, and Lincoln was of such humble parentage that he had to borrow books for his early education, and worked as a deck hand on a flatboat on the Ohio River. Jesus was born in a manger and John the Baptist fed on locusts and wild honey. [Applause.]

Everything else being equal, the greater the degree of liberty given to the people in government the greater the civilization of that people. Republican Greece is the best model of ancient democracy.

At one time her people kept in their hands all the rights to make laws and administer the government. They met in common council for that purpose—anyone could propose a law; all had a right to vote upon it. They elected the generals of their armies in this way, but for one year only at a time. Under this form of government she built up a civilization of literature, architecture, and art which astonishes the world—a civilization which has found its way into all modern civilization. No work on oratory would be complete without Demosthenese's oration on the Crown; no public structure would be complete without the aid of Grecian architecture.

The people of Arizona and New Mexico have been begging for statehood for a long time. They are entitled to it, and ought to have had it many years ago. They present us their constitutions, the product of the common people, for our ratification, but because the people have reserved certain rights to themselves not usually found in the constitutions of other States—the initiative, referendum, and recall—there seems to be a disposition on the part of some to require them to eliminate these new features from their organic law before admitting them into the Union.

The sudden forging of these new elements to the front in American politics naturally lead us to inquire for the cause. I have been casting about in search of it for some time, and I have reached the conclusion that the abuse of power intrusted to the hands of our public servants is the sole and only cause. For more than a quarter of a century bribery at elections has been the favorite method of inducting corrupt and unscrupulous men into high places of trust. By the same method we are led to believe unwholesome laws have been placed upon the statute books, conveying the rights of the people to criminal combines in perpetuity.

It has been shown that, in return, large sums of money have been subscribed by these combines for campaign purposes in order to defeat the will of the people. Soon after the passage of the Dingley tariff law in 1897 a wonderful commotion and scramble for advantage took place in the business and commercial world. Like the gathering of many storms at the same time in different parts of the country, each deepening in intensity and widening in circumference until their outer circles touched each other, then uniting and bursting forth in one mighty and dreadful tornado, sweeping across the country in its mad fury and destroying everything in its grasp. When this storm was over we found in its wake the lifeless but invisible bodies of nearly 9,000 independent corporations, out of this corporate wreck 445 combines had been perfected. The day of competition was over, but the morning of exclusion and exploitation of the people had dawned.

Since that time these 445 have been pushing closer and closer together, until now they have control of all the necessaries of life and can artificially increase the price thereof at will, which is a complete explanation of the high cost of living about which we have heard so much complaint of recent years.

The baneful and corrupting influence of their ill-gotten gains has found its way into political halls and legislative bodies, with the hope of obtaining new advantages and for longer terms, until the foul stench of bribery and corruption rises up from every quarter of the country and smells to high heaven, thereby flooding political circles with putrid rottenness far outranking in stench the famous Augean stables where 3,000 oxen had been stalled for 30 years. No one but Hercules could be found with strength enough to clean these stables. Can a modern Hercules be found with strength and courage sufficient to purify our political stables? The answer comes back in one grand chorus of more than 90,000,000 voices: "We, the common people, can and will do it. You can't intimidate us by calling us the mob. Our mission on earth is the liberation of suffering humanity from oppressive power. Our motto is 'Equal and exact justice to all.'" [Applause.]

Go where you will, the rich few are always trying to find an excuse to justify themselves in usurping the powers of government and reducing the masses to a condition of servitude. Our constitutional convention bristled with advocates of this doctrine, and a strong effort was made to fasten upon us a government of the rich with life tenure in office, modeled upon the plan of the Government of Great Britain. The Federal court is the product of this doctrine, and the present method of electing United States Senators is tinged with it. When a boy in the common school I read of Alexander Hamilton and learned to love him, because of his brilliancy, but perhaps more on account of his untimely death in an unfortunate duel. In more mature life, after I became a student of political economy, I read his speeches in the constitutional convention, and to my great surprise I found him to be an advocate of a government by the rich and an enemy of the masses. I could scarcely believe my own eyes when I read the following extract from his famous speech delivered in that convention on the 18th day of June, 1787, which is found in Volume I of his works, page 382, and which reads as follows:

> All communities divide themselves into the few and many. The first are the rich and the well born, the other the mass of the people. The voice of the people has been said to be the voice of God, and however generally this maxim has been quoted and believed it is not true in fact. The people are turbulent and changing. They seldom judge or determine right. Give, therefore, to the first class a distinct permanent share in the Government, they will check the unsteadiness of the second; and as they can not receive any advantage by a change they therefore will ever maintain good government. Can a democratic assembly, who annually revolve in the mass of the people, be supposed steadily to pursue the public good? Nothing but a permanent body can check the imprudence of democracy. Their turbulent and uncontrolling disposition requires checks.

To-day, while the people of New Mexico and Arizona are knocking at the door of the Union for statehood and self-government, we find advocates of that same selfish doctrine on the floor of this House, but instead of charging the common people with being "turbulent and changing," as did Mr. Hamilton, they are now branded by these gentlemen as the howling mob, the enemy of stable government. In the constitution of these Territories the people have reserved to themselves certain corrective rights over legislation and over their public servants. New Mexico has the referendum and Arizona has the initiative, referendum, and recall. Such power left in the hands of the people, especially the recall, is denounced as the "rankest of heresy." In answer to such argument, I ask where did all the power of administrative government come from at the time of the formation of the original colonies in America? It was all lodged in the hands of the plain, common people.

They could have kept it all had they so desired, but being honest, true, progressive, and manly they ceded certain of their rights to organize the general government, and it has been shown that the wisdom of these common people has excelled the wisdom of any monarch upon the throne or that of designing politicians seeking unlawful and unrighteous advantages in government for the purpose of extorting from the people unjust tribute and making themselves powerful and strong. [Applause.]

It is said by some that the constitution of one of these Territories gives too much power to the common people. In reply to that I say to those gentlemen that the only question to be observed by this Congress is as to whether this constitution is republican in its form, whether it will give to the people of the State of Arizona, when she becomes a member of this Union, a republican form of government. If it does, then we have done all as Representatives of this great Republic that is required at our hands in order to admit a Territory to the grand galaxy of States in this Union. [Applause.]

It is also said by others that the constitution of the Territory of New Mexico is so surrounded by restrictions that for 25 years it will be almost impossible for the people to get a constitutional convention in order to get a new constitution. It is also said that the limitations thrown around the right to amend the constitution are too great, that it is of such a character that it makes the rights of the people clumsy and awkward, and if burdens are to be borne through unguarded conditions in its constitution, the people will be powerless to amend it in a large measure. I say in reply to all of these arguments that I have examined both of these constitutions with some care, and, in my opinion, as a whole both of them, perhaps with the exception of Oklahoma, are the best that I have ever read from the hand of any constitutional convention in any State in this Union, not even excepting my own good State of Illinois. I desire, further, to state that the guards with reference to bribery and corruption in both of them are admirable, and every man in this beautiful Chamber ought to bow his head in reverence to the constitutional conventions for incorporating into their constitutions these wise provisions. [Applause.]

Again, Mr. Chairman, the provision giving to labor short hours and the further provision of giving labor an opportunity to recover for unjust injuries are so couched in these constitutions, and especially in that of Arizona, that they appeal to us in no unmistakable terms. [Applause.]

Four years ago, when Oklahoma presented her constitution to be ratified by Congress, it reserved to the people the initiative and referendum, and also required State banks to guarantee the payment of bank deposits. The tories in Congress then yelled themselves hoarse to prevent the admission of this Territory with these three powers left in the hands of the people. They predicted that riot, bloodshed, and bankruptcy would follow the adoption of such a constitution, but not so. It has brought to her people splendid results. [Applause.]

These same imperialists are here to-day opposing the constitution of Arizona, and run mad in their denunciation of the recall of public servants. They stand up and talk about the common people as though they were enemies of ours, as though they were enemies of organized government, as though they were enemies to civilization, as though they were not a part of this great Republic. But I can not reconcile their philosophy with the history of the American people. They are trying to show us the sun by the light of a candle. [Applause.]

The people of Arizona are not alone in their efforts to correct abusive legislation and hold public servants in check. In 1911 California adopted the initiative, referendum, and recall, but I believe she is the only State having the recall.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Oregon has had the initiative and referendum since 1902, and adopted the recall in 1908.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the gentleman. That makes three States with the initiative, referendum, and recall—California, Oregon, and Arizona. Nine have the initiative and referendum: South Dakota in 1898, Utah in 1900, Nevada and Montana in 1905, Missouri in 1906, Oklahoma in 1907, Maine in 1908, Arkansas in 1910, and New Jersey in 1911.

The following States have referendum in part on special questions or localities:

Colorado and Illinois, 1904; Iowa, 1891; Montana, 1903, New Mexico and Ohio, 1902; Rhode Island, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin, 1903.

Massachusetts has recall in Boston for the mayor, and has used the referendum repeatedly in its history.

Mr. Chairman, this proves that there is a decided tendency in America on the part of the people to take back to themselves certain rights which they have ceded to the General Government in the organic law of the various States of the Union. Democratic Switzerland is said to be the home of these reserved powers. For centuries the people of Great Britain have elected the members of the House of Commons. The ministry formulates a policy for the Government, and if at any time Parliament fails to indorse this policy the Crown prorogues Parliament, calls a new election, and the people settle these public questions by electing the members of a new Parliament, based upon the question in dispute.

This is akin both to the referendum and recall. Who will say that this feature in the English constitution has not been a blessing to Great Britain? It is one of the strongest features of safety and security in her whole legislative system. It brings her Government in close touch with the people, and gives them the right to settle questions of government upon which Parliament fails to agree.

We are told that our good President has refused to give his sanction to the constitution of Arizona because its provision for the recall of public officers is broad enough to include judges of courts, but that he does not object to its provisions as to the recall of other public officers. While I do not desire to pass upon the wisdom of the recall, yet I do say that if it is right as to all other public offices it should with equal propriety include the judges of courts. I have great reverence and respect for our courts of justice, but I have no less respect for the other positions of public trust.

The Federal court is too far away from the people and too close to politics and predatory wealth. Who will say that the Dred Scott and income-tax decisions were not political in character? Who will say that the late decision in the Standard Oil case does not legislate a joker in the Sherman antitrust law for the benefit of the trusts?

Mr. Chairman, we elect men to office to do for us what we can not do for ourselves. If they betray our confidence and there is any way to relieve ourselves of their obnoxiousness, whether it be a constable in a little country town or a judge in ermine upon the bench, we should do it. [Applause.] It is said that the judge would be handicapped in rendering his decisions, but, in reply, I say, Mr. Chairman, that the sheriff of a county with a writ in his hand for the arrest of a criminal would be handicapped in the same way. The same would be true as to all other officers of the country. [Applause.] I am in favor of stable government and would not support a measure opposed to it, but I am just as strongly committed to the wants of the people. [Applause.] If the constitutions of older States have failed to properly guard the rights of the people, thereby entailing hardships upon the masses, all the more, then, ought we to be on our guard here and see that like mistakes find no homes in these two constitutions. [Applause.] Remember it is hard to change constitutions after their adoption.

If the people of these Territories desire to safeguard their rights more carefully than has been done in the past by other States, in order to save themselves from evils which now afflict the people of older States, I believe we will commit a great wrong, of far-reaching magnitude, if we compel them to eliminate these safeguards before admitting them into the Union. [Applause.]

I would not change the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" in either of them. They have been passed upon by the intelligent common people of these Territories, and adopted by an overwhelming majority of all voting upon them. I have much confidence in the wisdom of these intelligent people. I have seen many of them and conversed with them, and dare say their intelligence will compare favorably with that of the people of any of the States. [Applause.] They are knocking; let us open unto them.

Let the common people write their will in the constitutions of these two Territories. They wrote the Declaration of Independence. They wrote the Constitution of the United States. They have been trusted to write the constitutions of 46 States. Why not let them write the constitutions of these Territories. Strike down the common people and you destroy representative government. Uphold the common people and behold a beautiful civilization represented by the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe that that beautiful banner has folds enough in it to cover every man, woman, and child in this broad land of ours. [Applause.] It was baptized in blood and consecrated by the lives and fortunes of the greatest men who ever led a brave army to a glorious victory. [Applause.] I believe, Mr. Chairman, that that sacred emblem, which was first unfurled to the breezes of heaven on the banks of the beautiful Brandywine and which hovered over the bloody tracks of barefoot soldiers from Valley Forge to Yorktown in order to witness the palsied hand of imperial power surrender the scepter of authority to the hand of liberty [applause]; I believe, Mr. Chairman, that that flag, which was with Jackson at New Orleans and witnessed Pakenham's legions vanish like the "children of the mist" and made us mistress of the high seas; I believe that that flag, which scaled the walls of Montezuma and forced Mexico to acknowledge our territorial rights; I believe that that flag, which trailed through blood from Bull Run to Appomattox, tore off the mask of slavery, and proclaimed to the world the everlasting Union of these States; I believe that that flag, which extended its benign influence to oppressed Cuba a few short years ago and enabled her to transfer her devotion from the god of royalty to the Goddess of Liberty, has ample virtue in its folds to lift the heavy hand of oppression from the heads of the oppressed in every country and in every clime. [Loud applause.]

I therefore, Mr. Chairman, invite the last piece of our territory, contiguous to this great country, and its citizens, to exchange the clumsy yoke of territorial servitude for the righteous robe of self-government. [Applause.] We welcome you to our sisterhood of States. We invite you to write your names in living letters of devotion on the bosom of that beautiful ensign of liberty, and thereby add two more stars in that grand galaxy in her field of living blue, which will give to us a country of the greatest possibilities, a union of 48 sovereign States over which the flag of freedom shall forever wave. [Loud and continued applause, followed by handshaking.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

[Mr. RAKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration joint resolution No. 14, to approve the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona, and had instructed him to report that they had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BANGOR, ME.

Mr. WETMORE. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. 2055) to provide for the erection of a public building at Bangor, Me., and I submit a report (No. 36) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site, and to contract, within the limit of cost hereinafter fixed, for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable and commodious building, including fireproof vaults, heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the post office and other Government offices at Bangor, Me., at a cost for said site and building of not exceeding $400,000.

An open space of such width, including streets and alleys, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine shall be maintained about said building for the protection thereof from fire in adjacent buildings.

For the purposes aforesaid the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the balance of the appropriation heretofore made by the sundry civil act of June 25, 1910, for the retaining wall and approaches at the former post-office building in said city, is hereby reappropriated and made immediately available, in addition to the appropriation hereinbefore made, toward the purposes of this act.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to sell, in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, the site and remains of the former post-office building in said city recently destroyed by fire; to convey the last-mentioned land to such purchaser or purchasers by the usual quit-claim deed, and to deposit the proceeds derived from such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a new public building at Bangor, Me., also for the sale of the site and ruins of the former post-office building."

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JOSEPH F. JOHNSTON.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I ask that a certain address by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], delivered December 31, 1907, before the Algonquin Club, Boston, Mass., be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 36.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order requested will be entered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JAMES L. BRADFORD.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, it was—Ordered, That the papers in the case of Senate bill 1232, Sixty-first Congress, first session, for the relief of James L. Bradford, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

STUDIES IN CRIMINOLOGY.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the manuscript of studies in criminology, including other patho-social conditions, now on the files of the Senate, be withdrawn and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DELIVERY OF MAIL FROM MOVING TRAINS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 47) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to as follows:

Whereas the Post Office Department has for more than 25 years last past been endeavoring to secure a device which will reduce to the minimum injury to persons and property incident to the delivering of mails to and from moving trains; and

Whereas the department has from time to time advertised for proposals for such a device, and has at different times appointed committees of experts to examine different devices presented for its consideration, all of which has occurred at great expense to the Government; and

Whereas the Postmaster General, on the 15th day of March, 1910, formally approved a device for this purpose; and

Whereas the Second Assistant Postmaster General, on the 5th day of May, 1910, stated in a communication to the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service that the device so approved had successfully stood the tests prescribed by the department and had been approved by the Postmaster General, and further stated that it was expected that all the railway companies using catcher service for the exchange of mails would take steps for the introduction of an improved system of exchanging the mails at such stations on or before the 5th day of May, 1911; and

Whereas it is known that the railway companies have not complied with the direction of the department: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish for the information of the Senate of the United States the causes of injuries to persons and damage and destruction of mail and mail equipment from accidents resulting from delivering and receiving mail to and from moving trains at what are known as catcher stations, the amount of mails, including newspapers and periodicals, lost or damaged, the places where the injury or damage occurred, the amount of loss to the Government or the railway companies, or both, on account of same, and also to state for the information of the Senate what, if anything, the department has done to compel the railway companies to equip their cars and stations with a suitable device approved by the department, in order to avoid the aforesaid injuries to persons and damage to mail and mail equipment.

THE STANDARD OIL CO. ET AL. V. THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. POMERENE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 48), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey et al. v. The United States, decreed, in effect, that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and 33 other constituent corporations and 7 individual defendants, John D. Rockefeller, William Rockefeller, Henry H. Rogers, Henry M. Flagler, John D. Archibald, Oliver H. Payne, and Charles M. Pratt, have united together to form and effect a combination, and as such conspired to monopolize and have monopolized, and are continuing to monopolize, a substantial part of the commerce among the States, in the Territories, and with foreign nations in restraint of interstate trade and commerce in violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman antitrust law; and

Whereas under the provisions of said act, if the said defendants, or any of them, or any one for them, has entered into a combination or monopoly in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, in the Territories, or with foreign nations, they are amenable to criminal prosecution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the United States what, if any, criminal prosecutions have been begun or are now pending against the said the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, or the said constituent companies, or individual defendants above named, or any of them, for violations of said sections 1 or 2 of said Sherman antitrust law.

REPORT ON SEIZURES OF COTTON.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 49), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate document room 1,000 copies of Executive Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress, second session, entitled "A Report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury," in relation to the number of bales of cotton seized under orders of that department after the close of the war.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. WETMORE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 50), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at a salary of $1,500 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 51) was read, as follows:

Whereas the Senate adopted a resolution June 20, 1910, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the charges relating to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas since the Senate voted on the report of that committee it is represented that new material testimony has been discovered in reference to such matter; and

Whereas the senate of the State of Illinois, on the 18th of May, 1911, adopted a resolution for the reasons therein stated, requesting the Senate of the United States to institute further investigation of the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate: It is therefore Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, sitting in banc, be, and are hereby, authorized and directed forthwith to investigate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress; to hold sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; to employ stenographers, counsel, and accountants; to send for persons and papers; to administer oaths; and as early as practicable to report the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee. The committee is further and specially instructed to inquire fully into and report upon the alleged "jack-pot" fund in its relation to and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed, under the rule, and, without objection, it will lie on the table.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted the following resolutions (S. Res. 52), which were read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas certain bills are now pending before the Senate Committee on Territories providing for a civil government for Alaska, these measures having been proposed looking toward a thorough readjustment of the rules applicable to the government and control of that Territory: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to investigate the present needs and requirements of the people of Alaska, having especial reference to such legislation as may be necessary and desirable for the purpose of establishing a form of self-government or otherwise for said Territory; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee or any subcommittee are hereby authorized to sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the sessions or recess of the Senate at such time or places as they may deem advisable; and be it further

Resolved, That they shall be empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such stenographic or other assistance as they may deem necessary for that purpose, the expense of such investigation or inquiry to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That the committee is authorized to compile the Territorial laws applicable to Alaska, and order such printing and binding as may be necessary for its use.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8649. An act to authorize the extension and widening of Colorado Avenue NW. from Longfellow Street to Sixteenth Street, and of Kennedy Street NW. through lot No. 800, square No. 2718, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent to take up House joint resolution 39.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, there have been a great many inquiries made as to just what the joint resolution I have offered as a substitute provides. I want to invite the attention of the Senate to the changes which it proposes in the Constitution, and I shall occupy but a very few moments.

I offered the substitute for the joint resolution chiefly for the reasons: First, I think it desirable, because it makes the least possible change in the Constitution to accomplish the purposes desired; that is, the election of Senators by popular vote; and, second, because it is in the same form in which it was voted upon at the last session, when it received within 4 votes of enough to insure its adoption. Since that vote was taken 10 Members of the Senate who voted against the joint resolution have been succeeded by other Members, and I am advised that a majority of the 10 new Members will vote for the joint resolution, so that I have no doubt of its passage if it is submitted to the Senate at this time in the form in which it was submitted at the last Congress.

If Senators will take the Constitution, Rules, and Manual of the Senate, and turn to the Constitution on page 184, in section 2, Article I, I will call attention to the changes which are proposed. First, I will direct the Senate's attention to section 3 of Article I, which reads as follows:

SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

This substitute of mine proposes to change that section by the striking out of the words "chosen by the legislature thereof" and inserting "elected by the people thereof."

The only change in section 3 is the substitution of the words "elected by the people thereof" for the words "chosen by the legislature thereof." That certainly is as simple a change as can be made. It involves no other question except the transferring of the election of Senators from the legislatures to the popular electors.

Then a change is made in section 2 of the same article, the section which refers to the House of Representatives. It now reads:

SEC. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

That provides for the election of Members of Congress; it provides the qualifications of the electors in such an election, and I have inserted that in my substitute, so that it reads:

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

I have used the exact language used in the Constitution prescribing the qualifications of electors who will vote for Senator that is used in prescribing the qualifications of electors who vote for Members of Congress—nothing more and nothing less. So this substitute of mine simply transfers the election of Senators from the legislatures to the people, and provides that the electors, when they cast their vote for a Senator, shall have exactly the same qualifications as the electors who cast their votes for a Member of the House of Representatives.

The only other change that is proposed to be made in the Constitution as it is now is a provision for the filling of vacancies. The Constitution as it now reads, referring to vacancies in the Senate, says:

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Instead of that, I provide the following:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Which is exactly the language used in providing for the filling of vacancies which occur in the House of Representatives, with the exception that the word "of" is used in the first line for the word "from," which, however, makes no material difference.

Then my substitute provides that—

The legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

That is practically the same provision which now exists in the case of such a vacancy. The governor of the State may appoint a Senator until the legislature elects. My amendment provides that the legislature may empower the governor of the State to appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy until the election occurs, and he is directed by this amendment to "issue writs of election to fill such vacancies."

That is, I use exactly the same language in directing the governor to call special elections for the election of Senators to fill vacancies that is used in the Constitution in directing him to issue writs of election to fill vacancies in the House of Representatives.

It is unnecessary for me to make any extended remarks in regard to my substitute for the joint resolution. I believe it is the best proposition, because it is the simplest of any that has been presented. It is substantially in the same language as the resolution which I introduced some two years ago, from which the joint resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was formed. A very extended discussion was had on the joint resolution in the last Congress. A great deal of outside controversy was injected into it. I do not believe that section 4 of Article I of the Constitution should be in any way touched by the pending joint resolution. It is a separate and distinct proposition, and I do hope that Senators will not insist that we repeal a part of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution in order that we may give the people of the various States an opportunity to elect their Senators at a general election, instead of by the legislature.

I do not intend to enter into any elaborate discussion of section 4, Article I, of the Constitution as to the wisdom or unwisdom of its being repealed or modified in any way, because I do not think it ought to have any part in this discussion. I am going to vote for the joint resolution, whether any substitute shall be adopted or not, because the great question here is whether the people shall have an opportunity to elect their Senators instead of having them elected by the legislature. I believe the joint resolution is better in the form proposed by the substitute; I believe that it will be more satisfactory to the people of the country in that form, and I sincerely trust that the issue will not be confused by injecting into the discussion controversies that are foreign to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, as read by him, provides:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen even second year—

And section 3, as quoted by him, provides:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof.

Section 4 also uses the word "chosen," only it is spelled in a different way. It provides:

But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter regulations, except as to the places of chusing Senators.

The Senator's proposed amendment inserts the word "elected," in line 9, on the first page, instead of the word "chosen," and yet he preserves the word "chosen" in the tenth line, on page 2. I desire to know if there is any distinction between the use of the two words, and whether it would not be better to have the language uniform through all sections of the Constitution.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, I do not think there is any material difference. The phrases "chosen by the legislature" or "elected by the legislature," it seems to me, mean the same thing. I have used the phrase "elected by the people thereof" because that is the phrase that is generally used in discussing the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will permit me, I am aware of that fact; but I ask, if that is so, why does he not use the same word in line 10 of page 2 of his amendment, where it provides—

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen, etc.—

Whereas previously the amendment provides that Senators shall be elected?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me a moment——

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the language the Senator from Kansas has used is entirely appropriate to accomplish the purpose which he intends to accomplish. In the first part of the proposed substitute the provision is:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof.

That is providing for a new method of selecting Senators. Heretofore they have been chosen by the legislatures; now they are to be elected by the people; but in the latter part of the proposed substitute, where the provision is that the amendment which alters the method by which Senators shall be elected shall not be construed so as "to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid," the word "chosen" is there used with reference to the selection by the legislature, while in the first part the word "election" is used with reference to the selection by the people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, if that distinction is intentional and of any significance whatever, why should not section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, which prescribes that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people," be amended also so that it will read "elected by the people," instead of "chosen by the people"?

Section 2 provides for the manner of electing Members of the House of Representatives and uses the word "chosen." My point is that if there is any subtle distinction between the use of the word "chosen" and the word "elected," the language should be uniform in the different sections of the Constitution which we are proposing to amend. I do not know that there is any distinction between them, and I am inclined to think there is not; but I do think that the word ought to be used uniformly at least for the appearance of the diction of the section.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that, in line 2, page 2, of the proposed amendment, the word should be "legislature" instead of "legislatures"; that is, the "s" should be stricken off of the word, so that it will be singular instead of plural.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified, if there be no objection.

Mr. BRISTOW. The point raised by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] I do not think is at all material. The word "chosen," which is in line 10, on page 2, simply refers to Senators who have been chosen under the phraseology of the Constitution as it now exists; and I can not see any objection to it in that connection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether the substitute which he has offered is in the same form and language as the substitute submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] upon which we voted at the last session?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is in the same form as the joint resolution which was amended on motion of the Senator from Utah at the last session.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, it will leave the question of the election of Senators by direct vote of the people stripped of every other proviso or rider with reference thereto, the sole question involved being the manner of their election?

Mr. BRISTOW. It simply incorporates the words "elected by the people" for the words "chosen by the legislature." That is the only change that is made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The safeguards which the Constitution has thrown around the authority of the General Government in the choice of these officers remains unimpaired?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Constitution is left just as it is now in that respect.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am only going to say that I am strongly in favor of the resolution providing for the direct election of Senators by the people. In many ways I have contributed toward that result and have voted for such a resolution while a Member of the House of Representatives. That proposition places me in direct harmony with the expressed wishes of the people of our State, and I desire to redeem that promise made by my party.

I do not believe it to be wise to burden this proposal with any race rider or kindred problem of any kind or character. I think it should be shorn of every burden or subterfuge calculated to defeat it before the legislatures of our States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. What particular feature of the joint resolution as it was introduced does the Senator consider to be a subterfuge?

Mr. CLAPP. We can not hear what the Senator from Idaho says.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not mean to use the term "subterfuge" as a criticism of the honored Senator from Idaho. I think perhaps he has his measure in as good form as he has been able to get it from the committee to which it was referred, and I am finding no fault with him about it. I think he is as zealous and as honest as any other Member of the Senate in his desire for this reform, but I regard the element of time and the general supervision which the Federal authority may now exercise over the choice of Senators, as well as Representatives, as very desirable to be retained in the Constitution, and it is my intention to vote for the substitute of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

If we can have this naked proposition, providing for the direct election of Senators by the people, unincumbered, I shall be very glad, but if the substitute of the Senator from Kansas shall fail, I then propose to cast my vote in favor of the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Idaho, and feel that by so doing I am discharging a solemn duty which I owe to the people of my State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas whether his substitute takes into account section 4 of Article I of the Constitution? Section 4 provides:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of chusing Senators.

Mr. BRISTOW. We leave that just as it is. It does not affect or change it in any way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then if his substitute were adopted there would still be a distinction between the power of Congress as it affects the election of Senators and as it affects the election of Representatives. That is, as it is now, Congress would have no power to alter the action of the legislature——

Mr. BRISTOW. It will have just the power that it now has. I do not undertake to change in any way the authority which the Congress has now over the election of Senators——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is to say, Congress would then have power to dictate to the States the places at which the election of Representatives should occur, while having no power to dictate to the States the places at which the election of Senators should occur.

Mr. BRISTOW. "But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." We leave that just as it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether that would not create possibly an awkward conflict where Congress has reserved the power in one case and not in the other?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not myself think it is a matter of any consequence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am merely inquiring to know whether they should not be placed in harmony. Does the Senator intend that Congress shall have no power over the States with relation to the places of choosing Senators, while it does retain that power over the States in the election for the choosing of Representatives?

Mr. BRISTOW. I can say no more than I said before, that I do not think the question of regulating the place where Senators should be elected is of any consequence. I am perfectly willing to leave the Constitution just as it is. Congress never has exercised that authority, and what I am seeking to do is to change the Constitution just as little as it can be changed in order to bring about a direct election of Senators by the people instead of an election by the legislature.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I merely raised this question because in the joint resolution as passed by the House of Representatives and as pressed by the Senator from Idaho that matter is made clear by the paragraph which provides that—> the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof——

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And in the joint resolution proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Kansas there seems to be an ambiguity, possibly, between the two provisions.

Mr. BRISTOW. I regret that the Senator should think there is an ambiguity. I think that the resolution as reported by the Senator from Idaho undertakes to amend section 4, and I did not want to amend section 4 in any way. I wanted to leave it alone, because I do not think it is necessary to amend it in order to accomplish the purpose that we are undertaking to accomplish here by this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, this subject has been very fully debated in the Senate, and I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate by going over the same arguments that I myself have already made or by repeating the arguments of others. I do wish, before the vote is taken, to state the position I take and the views which influence me to vote as I shall vote.

I shall vote for the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas, and I shall then vote against the proposition to amend the Constitution. I shall vote for the substitute because it strikes out from the proposed amendment the amendment of section 4 of Article I, and I shall vote against the proposition as a whole because I am opposed to the amendment of section 3 of Article I.

There are two separate, distinct, and independent amendments of the Constitution included in the joint resolution as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. One is an amendment to section 3, so as to provide for the election of Senators by the people instead of their election by the State legislatures. The other is an amendment of section 4 of Article I, so as to take away from the Congress of the United States the power to make or alter the regulations which may be prescribed by the several State legislatures in respect of the choosing of Senators.

The second amendment—that to section 4—is wholly unnecessary to the effectiveness of the first amendment, relating to the election of Senators by the people. There is no occasion whatever to destroy the power and authority of the Government of the United States over the process of constituting its own legislative body in order to secure the change of election from the State legislatures to the people of the several States. It is a new, additional, independent, disconnected, and unnecessary amendment of the Constitution. It has no place in the deliberations of this body or of any body upon the change in the manner of electing Senators. A change from the election by the legislature to an election by the people can be made with or without the other amendment, and wholly unaffected by it.

The people of the United States may wish for one and may not wish for the other. They ought not to be compelled to vote for one, which they may not wish for, as a condition for securing the other, which they may wish for. Each should stand upon its own basis. The people of the country should have an opportunity to vote to change the manner of the election of Senators, if they wish for it, without being compelled, as the price of getting it, to vote for the destruction of that control which the National Government has had from the beginning over the constitution of this great branch of the national institution.

I believe, sir, that the adoption of this amendment to section 4, which takes away the power of Congress to make in the last resort, if it finds it necessary, regulations to secure the effective, the honest, the uncontrolled selections of Members of the Senate, would be a reversal of the theory of the Constitution. I believe that it would strike a blow at that power of independent self-support which is essential to the perpetuity and the effectiveness of government. I believe that it would be a revertal to the theory of the old Confederation, under which the Government of the United States was dependent upon the States, and an abandonment of the theory of the Constitution under which we live, which was that the Government of the United States should stand erect and self-sustaining and have all the powers necessary for the maintenance of national life, dependent upon no State, upon no State legislature, and upon one power and upon no power whatever except the power of the Nation itself.

Mr. BORAH. Is it not true that the State legislature at this time has the sole and exclusive power to prescribe the manner of electing the electors who elect the President?

Mr. ROOT. It is.

Mr. BORAH. In what respect does this weakening of national powers differ from that which you choose to call a weakening with reference to the electing of electors?

Mr. ROOT. In this respect, Mr. President, if any State chooses not to take part in the election of the President, the President would be selected by the other States. Only the failure of all the States to perform their duty would prevent the election of a President.

Mr. BORAH. Is that not equally true with reference to Senators?

Mr. ROOT. No; it is not.

Mr. BORAH. If the State of New York should see fit not to choose her Senators, it would not hinder the State of Idaho from choosing hers?

Mr. ROOT. It would not; but it would prevent the Senate of the United States from having the representation of the State of New York in the membership of the body, and would render the Senate liable to have seats in the body filled by practices which might involve coercion, intimidation, and corruption, which it would have no power to prevent.

Mr. BORAH. The same effect precisely would be had upon the electoral college as to vacancies in the chairs, which should be filled in that college as would be had should the State fail to elect Senators.

Mr. ROOT. In the ultimate result, Mr. President, we would receive the votes and count them, and the President would be elected. Any State which failed to perform its function would lose its voice in the selection of a President.

But, Mr. President, there is no proposition here to change the provision of the Constitution in regard to the election of the President. The proposition here is to change the Constitution so as to take away from the National Legislature the power to make any regulations with regard to its own creation, and it is to that that I object.

We have had occasion to exercise the power of regulation both in regard to the election of Members of the House of Representatives and in regard to the election of Senators. Congress in 1842 passed a statute to regulate the election of Members of the House. It was found necessary in order to have effective and proper elections. It has passed repeated statutes since then, notably in 1872, and our elections are being conducted now under those statutes passed by the Congress. Congress has found occasion to regulate the election of Senators, and those elections are being conducted now under the statute passed in 1866. No man can say that the time will not come again when it will be necessary for the Congress, in order to secure uniformity, in order to secure effectiveness, in order to prevent abuses, to exercise its power in respect of regulating the times and the manner of electing Members to each House of the National Legislature.

But, Mr. President, it was not my purpose, as I have already said, to reargue this case. I have stated the substantial grounds upon which I prefer that the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas shall take the place of the original joint resolution. I shall oppose the resolution, then, on the ground that I think it is inexpedient and unnecessary to make any amendment of the Constitution at all in regard to the election of Senators. I believe that it will result in a deterioration in the personnel of the Senate. I believe that it will keep out of the Senate a large and important element well adapted to the performance of the peculiar and special duty of the Senate in our system of government. I believe that all the abuses which have led to such a desire for this change on the part of the people of the country can be cured by a simple amendment of the law, by amending the statute rather than by amending the Constitution of the United States.

Such a step I have already introduced. It was introduced at the last session and favorably reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It has been introduced again at this session and is now pending before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It provides for the election of Senators by a plurality, which is something that would be inevitable if we transfer the right of election from the legislatures to the people. It cures the evils which we have had by a simple amendment of the law. It affords an opportunity for a majority rule to control for a period which is stated in the bill as introduced at 20 days after the first convening of the two houses of the legislature. After the operation of 20 days has failed to produce an election by the majority rule, it provides for the application of a plurality rule.

Mr. President, I fully recognize the fact that we have going on throughout a large part of the country a process of change, a process of experiment in the way of modifying our governmental institutions. I recognize the fact that the people of many States have become dissatisfied with the way in which their political machinery has acted and that they desire to change it. I have great sympathy with the feeling and take great interest in the experiments that are being tried. I believe that good will come from the awakened interest of the people of the country in their own political affairs and from their determination to take a part in their affairs and to make their will effective.

But, sir, it is a process of experiment. We can not change the institutions of more than a century without long trial and consideration. Experiments will fail; experiments will succeed. All of us will see opportunities for modification and improvement. No one of us can evolve from his own thought, not all of us together can by conference produce, results which we may feel sure are better than the methods devised by the framers of our Government until the results have been put to the test of practical application.

The system under which we live, Mr. President, has produced the best results that ever have come from the experiments of mankind in government. We have received from our present institutions manifold blessings, and in the providence of God have wrought out under those institutions results which have made for the happiness, for the liberty, for the advancement of all mankind. With all history strewn with the wrecks of effort in government, with human nature still unchanged, I would hesitate long before assuming that my own judgment or the judgment of all of us can improve the system and framework of our Government except upon experiment and demonstration by practical application.

Mr. President, I do not like to see experiments begin or proceed in their early stages by amendments to the Constitution in advance of their being tried out fully. Amendments should be the result of long deliberation and trial. They should not initiate deliberation and trial.

For these reasons, sir, I shall take the course regarding the substitute and the joint resolution, whether the substitute be adopted or not, which I have indicated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I had not intended to open my mouth at this session of the Senate of the United States, but it seems to me that it is necessary that my own position upon this question should be made clear. This is one of those curious and interesting cases where by keeping the language of the law just as it is in one place after a change in another place you change the facts, and where the only way of not changing the facts in their practical operation is to omit or change the language.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is not only distinguished but notorious for his intellectual ingenuity, and with all of his ingenuity he can not cover up this practical change. The fact to-day is that when the people of Mississippi undertake to elect a legislature which is to elect a Senator the United States Government can not, does not pretend even to have the right to, interfere at the polls where the people are voting. If this change is made and the language in section 4 left just as it is and not omitted, then the power of the Federal Government is extended just that much further than it is to-day, to wit, that afterwards the Federal Government can at least pretend to the right, whether it have it or not, to interfere at the polls in the State of Mississippi when a Senator is being elected.

Now, gentlemen may refine all they please. They may split hairs "as betwixt the nor' and the nor'west side," but they know, just as well as the country, if intelligent, will know, that when they are pleading that the Constitution shall not be changed in section 4 they are really pleading that the relations between the Federal Government and the people at the polls shall be changed by adding a power which the Federal Government now has not, with regard to the presence and supervision of the election of a Senator.

I am not astonished at the position taken by the Senator from New York, because his object is to defeat the amendment to the Constitution making Senators to be elected by the people, and, of course, if he can force a large body of southern representatives by the adoption of the amendment of the main joint resolution as reported by the committee to a position of opposition he has with him upon the final vote against the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution just that many votes; and I presume, knowing his intelligence, that he has taken a reckoning of that fact. But I am a little astonished that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who desires the adoption of the amendment electing Senators by the people, should push his natural allies upon this subject, southern Senators, into that unnatural position.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York tells us that we should go slowly about changing the Constitution of the United States. It is strange that a New York Republican should tell a Democrat of my school that. I feel that, too; but the people of the United States have not gone rapidly about this. They have been considering it a long time. The Senate of the United States has been "tried in the balance" and, rightfully or wrongfully, wisely or foolishly, the people of the United States have concluded that as now constituted it has been found wanting.

I do not believe that the election of Senators by the people will result in any deterioration of the intellectual ability which will represent the States upon this floor. I know, as the Senator from New York says, that it might result in excluding from this Chamber "a certain element" which is of the highest ability in administering affairs, but it is an element that the people of the United States have concluded has been represented here too much.

Mr. President, I can not for the life of me see why the Senator from Kansas should desire to put us in the attitude in which he will put us if his amendment to the joint resolution shall prevail. Can no popular reform of any description be instituted in the United States without mulcting the South somewhere along the line—without demanding of her some special sacrifice? The Senator from Kansas, of course, knows as well as I do that if the joint resolution as it has come from the committee shall prevail there will be no change in the facts, in the practical operation of things, in the present relationship between the Union and the States, whereas if he makes the change of fact by keeping the words which he proposes to keep in section 4, he does bring about practically the condition of things which our people at home would not admit for a moment of our overlooking, and concerning which they would condemn us if we omitted to take proper notice here and now.

Mr. President, I had not intended to be heard at all. That much I thought I ought to say.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have no intention of discussing this question at any great length. It was very fully discussed by the Senate within the last two or three months. But I do want to say a word or two to point out my position with reference to the joint resolution, and with reference to the substitute for it which has been proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

In the first place, I am in hearty sympathy with the general proposition to amend the Constitution so as to provide for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people. I am not going into any discussion of my reasons for that position. They have been stated very often. A United States Senator is a representative officer precisely the same as a Member of the House of Representatives, and I can see no reason why such a representative officer should not be elected by a direct vote of the people the same as a Member of the House of Representatives. I do not agree with the suggestion which has been made that we will in some unfortunate way affect the efficiency of this body or of the individual members of it. I think the tenure of office, six years, will of itself operate to mark whatever difference is desirable between these two great bodies—the House and the Senate.

It has been suggested that if we shall adopt this amendment and provide for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, it will next be proposed to destroy the equal representation which the States of the Union now enjoy in the Senate, and that we shall have a proposition, which ultimately will be adopted, that will provide for the same measure of representation that prevails in the other House, and that Senators will be elected in proportion to population and there will not be, as now, an equal representation from each State.

I do not well see how that can be brought about under that clause of the Constitution which provides that no State shall be deprived of its equal representation in this body without its own consent. I know it has been suggested that even that might be amended; but to destroy that provision would not be a change of the Constitution by the orderly processes of constitutional amendment. It would be equivalent to a revolution. That is the one thing which the people who framed this Constitution stipulated among themselves should never be altered so long as one State in the Union objected to it. I am not at all afraid that any serious attempt will ever be made to bring about that result.

But, Mr. President, while I am strongly in favor of this general proposition, I am opposed to the joint resolution as it has been presented, because the resolution as presented proposes not to accomplish the one result of electing Senators by direct vote of the people, but it proposes to accomplish that and another and an additional result, namely, the surrender of the power which the Government of the United States has possessed over the election of Senators from the foundation of this Government to the present day. The Constitution of the United States provides, in the first instance, that the legislatures of the various States shall regulate the times, places, and manner of choosing Representatives and of United States Senators, but that Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations. If we shall take out of the Constitution so much of it as provides for the exercise of this power on the part of Congress with reference to the election of United States Senators, we shall introduce into the Constitution, as I view it, an inconsistent and an altogether inharmonious condition.

The Constitution is entirely consistent and harmonious with itself. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], interrupting the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] a few moments ago, called his attention to the fact that Congress had no power to regulate the time, place, or manner of the election of electors for President. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from New York only addressed himself to the question of the "manner."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Constitution expressly provides respecting the time. The Senator is correct. He calls attention to the fact that the Constitution does not provide for the exercise of the supervisory power on the part of Congress over the manner of electing electors, but the Constitution does preserve the power of Congress over the action of the electors themselves. In other words, the Constitution all the way through preserves the power of the Government of the United States to regulate the ultimate electors of the officers for whose election provision is made. In the case of Representatives the people vote directly for the officer; they are the ultimate electors. So the Constitution preserves the supervisory power of Congress over the people, who in that instance are the electors. In the case of United States Senators the people are not the ultimate electors, but the legislatures of the various States are. So the Constitution preserves the supervisory control of Congress over those bodies as the ultimate electors. In the case of the President of the United States the electors, so called, are the ultimate elective power. So the Constitution preserves the authority of Congress over those electors. The whole system is entirely consistent and entirely harmonious.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] was addressing himself to the question of the power under the Constitution to control elections for the purpose of insuring proper elections, and, with that end in view, I asked if it were not true that the legislatures prescribed the manner of electing electors. So far as the local election is concerned, the State legislature has absolute and exclusive control over the manner of electing electors. After the electors are elected they are in the same attitude that we are after elected. But, so far as the election of electors in the several States are concerned, to prescribe the manner of election, that is a matter which rests exclusively and alone with the legislature of the State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is all quite true, but it in no manner, as it seems to me, affects the contention which I have made with reference to it.

Mr. BORAH. I think, Mr. President, that that is true, but I think it affects the proposition which the Senator from New York has made as to the manner of controlling a local election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from New York has demonstrated that he is quite capable of taking care of himself.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I shall not undertake to do that for him.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has said that the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], while it ostensibly preserves the constitutional provision as it is, in reality makes a change in it. If I understand him, his position is that now, under the Constitution, Senators are not elected by a vote of the people, but are elected by the legislatures, and that, therefore, under the Constitution, Congress has no supervisory power over the acts of the voters themselves, and that by preserving this section 4 in the Constitution unaltered Congress will hereafter have an authority over the voters of the States which it does not now possess with relation to the election of United States Senators; but, as it seems to me, that argument is somewhat misleading and disingenuous. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have the supervisory control over the election of Representatives and the supervisory control over the election of Senators. The manner in which those different officers shall be elected has nothing whatever to do with the provision in the Constitution that the ultimate supervisory power shall exist in Congress; in other words, if the Constitution had provided in the beginning for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, as it did for the election of Representatives by direct vote of the people, can there be the slightest doubt in the mind of anybody that the framers of the Constitution would have provided for the ultimate supervisory control of Congress over the election of Senators in that way precisely as it did over the election of Representatives?

Can any man give me any good reason why the supervisory control of Congress over the election of Representatives should be preserved when they are elected by the people and the supervisory control of Congress over the election of Senators should be destroyed when they are elected in precisely the same way? There is no change in principle. It is simply the application of an existing principle of the Constitution to new conditions.

We have illustrations of that in other parts of the Constitution. When the clause which gives Congress authority to regulate commerce among the several States was first adopted, it had no application to railroads; it had no application to telegraph lines; it had no application to telephones. Why? Because they were not in existence; but the moment those instrumentalities came into existence that provision of the Constitution applied to them of its own force at once. So, when this provision was put into the Constitution it was intended to operate irrespective of the manner of election, and when we provide for a new method of election the supervisory power of Congress already provided for in the Constitution at once and automatically attaches to that new condition of affairs.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] undertakes to find fault with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] for having presented this substitute and made it impossible, according to his statement, for some Senators upon the other side to support it, and he warns the Senator from Kansas that it may result in the defeat of the joint resolution. I have no doubt in my own mind that if the substitute of the Senator from Kansas is not adopted it spells the defeat of this joint resolution—I do not mean necessarily in the Senate, but I mean before the country and before the legislatures of the country. If Senators who are in favor of giving up this supervisory control of Congress believe that the country is ready for it, let them present it by itself; let it stand upon its own feet; let it stand or fall by its own strength. I think if it should be separately proposed by Congress, not only would it not obtain a vote of three-fourths of the States of the Union, but it would not obtain the vote of a fourth of them.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. If the Senator will allow me, I intend, of course, to vote against the proposed amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], but I shall vote for the joint resolution, even if the amendment be adopted. I want to call the Senator's attention, however, to a remark he made, which, I think, will require some modification. He said that, in his judgment, the framers of the Constitution, if they had provided that Senators should be elected by the people, would have adopted this supervisory power. I want to call his attention, or, rather, his recollection, to the fact that New York and, if I remember aright, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, in ratifying the Constitution adopted a provision in the act of ratification that, in the contemplation of those States ratifying it, never was intended to give Congress any such power as that; that the only power it was ever intended to confer upon Congress was the power to act when the States failed to act.

Now, just one word further. I will only take a moment. Let us look at New York. The preamble to the ratification in New York recited:

> In full confidence, nevertheless, that until a convention shall be called and convened for proposing amendments to the Constitution * * * that the Congress will not make or alter any regulation in this State respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives unless the legislature in this State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same, and that in those cases such power will duly be exercised until the legislature of this State shall make provisions in the premises.

Pennsylvania, in adopting the Constitution, provided:

> That Congress shall not have power to make or alter regulations concerning the time, place, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives, except in case of neglect or refusal by the State to make regulations for the purpose, and then only for such time as such neglect or refusal shall continue.

The State of Massachusetts did the same thing, as also did Rhode Island. I can not agree with the Senator's contention.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There were a number of States which took that view.

Mr. RAYNER. The idea of this clause was that where the States failed to act Congress should act, but it never was intended and never was in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution; and the Senator will, I think, never be able to find in the debates of that body any recognition of the principle that the authority of the Congress should supersede the regulations of the States.

One other word before the Senator sits down with reference to the electors. There is a specific power in the Constitution that the States shall have the right to appoint electors. The Constitution confers the right upon the States to appoint their own electors. It provides—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress.

There is no provision in the Constitution giving Congress supervisory power of the manner in which the States shall determine the matter or the regulations as to the election of electors.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; but over the action of electors when chosen the power of Congress has been preserved. The Constitution not only preserves the power of Congress, but provides how those electors shall discharge their duties.

Mr. RAYNER. But not their selection.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to ask the Senator from Maryland a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. What force does the Senator from Maryland give to the words "or alter such regulations"? Section 4, Article I, provides—

> But Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations.

How could they alter such regulations if their power was to exist only in case the State failed to make any?

Mr. RAYNER. I can answer that by saying that where the regulations were not sufficient for the purpose of accomplishing the purpose they intended the power attached. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from New York will say, in looking over the debates in the Constitutional Convention, although, of course, it does not bear practically upon this question at all, and I do not care what the debates were in the Constitutional Convention now, I do not think he would say that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution or that it was the intention of the States that ratified the Constitution that Congress should have a supervisory power over the election regulations of the States. That power was deemed to exist in Congress only when the States failed to send Senators here and Representatives to the House of Representatives, and the word "alter" meant when they did not sufficiently accomplish the purpose. The action in the New York convention, in the Pennsylvania convention, in the Rhode Island convention, in the Massachusetts convention, and in other conventions of other States that I do not now recall shows plainly that it was never the intention to give Congress the power that the Senator from Utah claims it would have been given if the Constitution had originally provided for the election of Senators by the people, and that the framers of the Constitution would not have conferred any such power upon Congress as the Senator from Utah now wants to confer upon it. Of course, Congress has exercised the power with the approval of the courts, but I am speaking now of what was within the contemplation of the ratifying States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am entirely familiar with the resolutions to which the Senator from Maryland refers, but, with all due respect to him, they do not meet in any degree the contention that I am making. I care not whether the position of the Senator from Maryland is correct about it or my position is correct about it; my proposition is that the framers of the Constitution would have given Congress the same power, whatever it may be, of supervision over the election of Senators that it does give them under the Constitution if they had been elected by a direct vote of the people. It gave the Congress the ultimate supervisory control over the election of Representatives, and they were elected by the people; it gave the ultimate supervisory power over the election of United States Senators, and they were elected by the legislature; but if the Constitution had provided that Senators should be elected by the people, the same as Representatives were elected by the people, the framers of the Constitution would have given to Congress exactly the power which they had given them over the election of Representatives. That is my contention.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator from Utah admit that our forefathers and the Constitution regarded the Senators as peculiarly the representatives of the States—in a certain sense as ambassadors?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know that I quite understood the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say, does not the Senator from Utah admit that our forefathers and that the Constitution contemplated the Senators as peculiarly the representatives of the States, the Senate itself as a body being representative of the State and not of the people of the State?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is a representative——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if that is the case, does the Senator think they would have made exactly the same rule for the Representatives elected by the people and for these men who in their view were in a sort of way ambassadors from the States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Mississippi is a representative of his State in one sense, but a Senator represents the people of his State the same as a Representative represents the people of his State. And beyond that a Senator is not only a representative of his State, but he is a Senator of the United States. He exercises——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I am trying to get at, if the Senator will permit me, is this: Not in your contemplation nor more than in mine, for things have evolved since then very much, but whether in the contemplation of our forefathers the Senators were not the representatives of the States, of the corporate body, the State, more than of the people of the State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, let me concede that, then——

Mr. WILLIAMS. This body was inaugurated for the very preservation of the equality of the States, was it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me concede that, at any rate, for the sake of argument, and what does the Senator make of it? Does the Senator think that because that distinction might exist Congress ought to preserve no control over the election of United States Senators while it does preserve control over the election of Representatives?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does that constitute a reason for that distinction?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The reason for that distinction is just as when a congress of people meet. There are so many delegates, and the congress itself has no control over the delegates.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can not follow the Senator in that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am saying that because you went back historically to the beginning; and if we are to go back, I should like to go back to the atmosphere that surrounded those people. Of course I admit, as a matter of fact, in the course of historical evolution that the very nature of institutions change because of the nature of new demands made upon them.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will let me have just a moment, I will yield to him.

To my mind, if there can be a distinction, there is more reason for the preservation of the supervisory control of Congress over United States Senators than over Representatives, because——

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will hear me through—because a Senator of the United States, while he may be, as the Senator says, a representative of the State, is more a representative of the United States than is a Member of the House. The Representative, the Member of the House of Representatives, has nothing to do with the question of treaties. He has nothing to do with the confirmation of appointees to Federal positions and ambassadors to foreign governments. The Senator of the United States passes upon treaties with foreign governments. A Senator of the United States advises and consents to the appointment of the judges, ambassadors, and all the other officers of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In that condition, can it be said that the Government of the United States should absolutely yield to the States its control over the election of such an officer, who discharges these important functions of the National Government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And from their standpoint at that time one of the very reasons why they gave all these extraordinary powers to the Senate was that the Senate was peculiarly representative of the equality of the States.

Now, right here one other question. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] says that he wants to add to the present powers of the General Government this right to be present at the polls in a State when the Senator is elected.

Mr. ROOT. To retain it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is my standpoint. Of course, his standpoint is that he is keeping things as they are. He says that one reason why the Federal Government must do that is because it must continue its own existence in the Senate and that New York must have her Senator here.

I want to ask the Senator if, under the present condition of things, there is any way under the sun to compel Colorado to send a Senator here?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Absolutely none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. None under the sun. So that the argument which he makes there is no more against the condition of things that would exist if the joint resolution of the committee should pass than it is at present.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Utah has been very liberal in allowing interruptions. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield to the Senator briefly.

Mr. RAYNER. I object on general principles to interpretations of the Constitution which, in my opinion, were not sanctioned at all at the time it was adopted. The best way to get at what the Constitution means is to get at what the States meant when they ratified it. Nine out of the 13 States in their articles of ratification held that this clause does not mean what the Senator from Utah says it does mean. The records of the other 4 States have been lost, but I have no doubt they would follow in the same line. It will not take me a moment——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator right here, whatever it means, why destroy the power?

Mr. RAYNER. Because it means just exactly what we say it means. We give the State the right to provide for the manner of electing Senators. And that is exactly what it meant, unless the States decline to act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Just a moment, and then I shall have finished. I will just read this—it is only a few lines—and then I will not detain the Senator.

The matter has always been so clear to me that I do not like to have a statement made upon the floor of the Senate contrary to what I think the framers of the Constitution meant. Here is what the State of South Carolina said:

> And whereas it is essential to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States, and the freedom of the people, under the operation of a General Government that the right of prescribing the manner, time, and places of holding the elections to the Federal Legislature should be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States, this convention doth declare that the same ought to remain to all posterity a perpetual and fundamental right in the local, exclusive of the interference of the General Government, except in cases where the legislatures of the States shall refuse or neglect to perform and fulfill the same according to the tenor of said constitution.

Now, Virginia said:

> That Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, or either of them, except when the legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled by invasion or rebellion to prescribe the same.

You have nine States. I never have had any doubt after a most careful examination as to the proposition that if the records of the other four States could be found they would substantiate the declaration in the ratification of these States. At least we have the records of nine of them, every one of them giving is as the opinion of the ratifying convention that it never was intended to repose in Congress the power that Congress has unlawfully exercised in regard to the matter.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] at the last session of Congress cited these various acts of ratification to which I have referred and demonstrated the proposition that I am now contending for.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. The unfortunate thing, Mr. President, with the position of the Senator from Maryland is that if this paragraph is amended, whether the legislature acts or fails to act, in any event the Congress of the United States will have absolutely no power, and therefore the statement made by the Senator from Maryland is not germane and has no force, because the original joint resolution does not even give the Congress the power to act when the legislature utterly fails. Here is the language, and the only language, left in the original joint resolution:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

There is no proviso here giving Congress the power to act in case the legislature fails to act.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Minnesota is contesting with a shadow. There is not the slightest possibility of a State declining to send a Senator to the Senate of the United States. There was danger at the time the Constitution was adopted. There is not now the slightest practical danger of a State not sending a Senator here.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. RAYNER. I will permit an interruption, but the Senator from Utah has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. RAYNER. I am talking about the intention of the framers of the Constitution. The Senator from Utah says it was the intention to give Congress a supervisory power. I know very well they have exercised a supervisory power, but I say when you look over the ratification of the States you can come to but one conclusion, and that is that it never was the intent of the framers of the Constitution; and let me say another thing, that the Constitution never would have been raified if the States had believed that that was the intention.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to ask the Senator from Maryland a question, with the permission of the Senator from Utah.

The Senator from Maryland made the assertion that there was not the slightest danger that any State would ever fail or refuse to send representatives to the Congress of the United States. The history of the United States discredits that assertion.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not think it does, Mr. President. I should like the Senator to point out where it discredits it. It does not discredit it in the case of the State of Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, there were certain years in the history of this country when certain States did not send representatives here.

Mr. RAYNER. And there were certain years in the history of the country when the Senate turned down Senators who were sent here and put in Senators who were never lawfully elected to the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was merely referring to the statement of the Senator—that such conditions could never exist.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to make just a suggestion here, because it illustrates what I may say is an exaggeration of the effect of section 4? At the time that the States did fail to send Senators here, of what earthly use was section 4 to the United States? We did not exercise any power under it. We could not exercise any power under it. It was utterly useless to accomplish anything which now by imagination it is suggested might be accomplished.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Of what earthly use was the Constitution anywhere—any part of it—during the Civil War?

Mr. BORAH. Well, I think it served a very good use. It held us together up here. But this particular section was never intended to give us the power to go into the States and elect Senators, and we have not that power now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. I hope he will.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is in the Constitution a process of compelling the election of Senators and Representatives, which was adopted at that time, and it was an effective process. It took a little while to do it, but the Government of the United States compelled those States to resume the functions of statehood and send their representatives here. It was only a question of how they would do it, and they adopted the only method of doing it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho, and then I must proceed.

Mr. BORAH. I assert that never at any time did the Congress of the United States undertake to exercise any power under this section to compel any State to elect a Senator or a Representative.

That statement has been made here on the floor time and time again, and I challenge any Senator to point to a single instance, to a single statute, or a single proceeding under section 4 of the Constitution looking to the accomplishment of that purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can refer you to one.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may be permitted here, I think——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This whole discussion is aside——

Mr. HEYBURN. Three words will answer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield to the Senator, but I hope he will be brief.

Mr. HEYBURN. By processes of martial law it made a government for these States.

Mr. LODGE, Mr. RAYNER, and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I must decline to yield further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah declines to yield further. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. RAYNER. I only wanted to say to the Senator that martial law is no law at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has not yielded to the Senator from Maryland. He yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I will detain the Senator but a moment. I only wanted to say that it seems to me Senators forget the origin of those provisions. They were put in because toward the close of the Revolution the States failed to send delegates, in many cases, to the Continental Congress, and during the Confederation they absolutely brought the Government to a standstill by their failure to provide representation at the seat of government, and this was put in to prevent the new Government from being paralyzed in that way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to get back to the point where I was when the storm broke.

The Senator from Maryland has called attention to the resolutions passed by several of the States in which in substance they declared that this clause of section 4 was only intended to operate in case the States failed to act. Now, I care not whether that was the view of the framers of the Constitution or the view of those who ratified the Constitution. The point that I was making to the Senator was that whatever their view of the scope and meaning of this provision was they intended it should operate upon the election of Representatives and United States Senators, whether they were elected by the people or by the legislature. Whether you give it a broad application or a limited application, they did not intend to make a distinction as to the power which should be exercised based upon the manner in which the Senator or the Representative should be elected. But if that was the original intention of the framers and that was the view of these States it has been construed to have a broader operation during the 124 years of the existence of the Republic, and the people of the United States during that 124 years have been quite content to leave that provision in the Constitution with that broad interpretation of it.

Now, Mr. President, it has been suggested that even if we eliminate this clause of section 4 from the Constitution the power will still exist in Congress to regulate the manner of the election of United States Senators, under the general provisions of the Constitution. I do not agree with that view. I think if we provide in express terms by an amendment to the Constitution that the legislatures of the States shall be given the authority to make regulations as to the times, place, and manner of election of Senators, that will constitute the last expression of the people's will upon that subject.

The language is exclusive. It is specific. It confers upon that one agency the power to do this thing; and the rule of statutory construction is too well settled to admit of dispute, that when we have conferred a specific power, in exclusive terms, upon one agent, we, by that very act, deny it to any other agent. I can not understand——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. I can not understand how, when we shall have conferred the express, positive, and exclusive power upon the State governments, any power to do that same thing can remain in the General Government under any general language of the Constitution.

Now I will yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Supreme Court has said in the case of McPherson v. Blacker, with which the Senator is familiar:

> Under the second clause of Article II of the Constitution, the legislatures of the several States have exclusive power to direct the manner in which the electors of President and Vice President shall be appointed.

The Congress has from time to time passed certain acts protecting elections with reference to Representatives and Senators and electors, and the Supreme Court has sustained those acts, when sustained at all, upon other grounds and according to other powers than that found in section 4.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In what case did the Supreme Court say that?

Mr. BORAH. In one of the cases which the minority cited in their views.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Siebold case?

Mr. BORAH. No; the Yarborough case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I must entirely disagree with the Senator with regard to that. The Yarborough case is based upon the Siebold case, in One hundredth United States, and the Siebold case expressly holds that the act which was passed was under clause 4 of Article I of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. I will read the section to the Senator, and I will submit to him here on the floor whether he thinks that section was based on section 4.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is referring to the act of 1872. I would not undertake to say that every section was passed under that clause. There may have been some sections that were not.

Mr. BORAH. But the section which the court was construing was section 5508. It was not passed by virtue of section 4, and the court did not undertake to uphold it by reason of section 4.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I say about it is this: Heretofore the express power has rested in Congress, in the last analysis, to supervise the time and manner of the election of Senators. If the people of the United States, in effect, repeal that provision, take it out of the Constitution, so that it shall no longer exist in the Constitution, and confer in exclusive terms that identical power upon the State legislatures, I can not understand under what rule of construction it could possibly be held that the power would still exist in the General Government as it exists now. It will be taken away in express terms and expressly conferred upon somebody else, and it can not at the same time be taken away and still exist, as it seems to me.

Now, Mr. President, I want to hurry along and get through, because it is not only getting late, but it is continuing warm.

This power has been exercised from time to time, and necessarily exercised, by the General Government. It passed at one time—I do not recall the exact date of it—a law which fixed the uniform time for the holding of elections. That was a necessary law. It could not have been passed so far as United States Senators are concerned if the joint resolution advocated by the Senator from Idaho had been in force.

We passed at a later time a provision with reference to the character of the ballot, providing that the ballot should be written or printed. Those laws have a uniform operation throughout the United States. Without the provision for a printed ballot it would have been entirely competent for a State to have provided for an election by a viva voce vote.

We provided for the use of the voting machine by a later act. The act of 1872, while perhaps not entirely based upon that clause, was at least in part based upon it, as the Supreme Court held in the case to which I have already referred.

Now, there is one other thing that I desire to call attention to in this connection, and that is that the burden of proof in this matter is upon those who undertake to change the existing provision of the Constitution. It is for them to show that no harm would result. It is indeed for them to show more than that—not only that no harm will result from it, but that some positive good is to result from this amendment to the Constitution. It does not seem to me that that has been done or attempted up to this moment.

If we amend the Constitution in this particular, however unwise it may be hereafter found to be, no matter what embarrassment the change may occasion to the General Government, it will be utterly impossible for us to retrace our steps. We can prevent its being done. One-fourth of the States of the Union may prevent this change from being made; but when it has once been made, no matter how important the restoration of the provision may be made hereafter to appear, it will be impossible to put it back into the Constitution except by a vote of three-fourths of the States, and that probably never could be obtained.

Something was said in a former debate on this question to the effect that the several States may be trusted to see that the elections are fairly conducted, their purity preserved, and their freedom from sinister influences guaranteed and protected. I do not doubt, and I think no one doubts, the truth of this assertion under the normal conditions which prevail to-day; but the Constitution is made, not for to-day alone, or for a month hence, or a year hence, but for a vastly expanding and constantly changing future, the nature and extent of which no man can with any degree of certainty predict.

We may indulge the hope, we may believe, that no occasion will ever arise for the exercise of the ultimate authority of Congress in this regard, and yet we can not with safety close our eyes to the fact that occasion has arisen in the past, and that what has happened may happen again. This authority of Congress will be and should be exercised sparingly in the future, as it has been exercised sparingly in the past.

The Constitution, by devolving upon the States the primary duty and responsibility, clearly contemplates that Congress shall not intervene so long as normal and healthful political conditions prevail, but who among us is so wise as to know that these normal and healthful conditions will always continue?

True, the States are interested in the election of Senators, but has the Nation no interest? The interest of the States is one of great importance, but that of the Nation is vital. If the retention of this ultimate supervising power in the Nation be an expression of distrust in the State governments, which it is not, will not its elimination express a loss of confidence in the wisdom and fairness of the National Government?

The Nation is simply the whole of which the States constitute the integral parts. We are an "indissoluble Union of indissoluble States." If in a Nation so constituted there are degrees of fidelity, surely the whole may be trusted to preserve the integrity of the various parts more safely than each of the several parts may be relied upon to preserve the integrity of the whole.

There is the one tremendous lesson of our history—some of the States once sought to dismember the Union, but the Union has never sought and will never seek to dismember itself. I am for preserving the power of the Nation unimpaired and undiminished, not for the normal ordinary days when the power may safely remain uninvoked, but for that rare and exceptional day of stress when its exercise shall become of imperious and overshadowing necessity—when the strong, supervising, compelling hand of the Federal Government not only may but must stretch forth to preserve it from disaster or from destruction.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is on the floor, and as he perhaps desires to proceed under his notice of yesterday, I am going to have the joint resolution laid aside temporarily, but before doing so I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? No objection is heard.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate the following resolution.

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar 4, Senate resolution by Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A resolution (S. Res. 6) to appoint a special committee to investigate certain charges relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, when I concluded last evening speaking upon the resolution which I introduced, I had reviewed the leading facts of the case upon which the Senate passed on the 1st of March, 1911. I did not pretend, except in the briefest possible way, to make any summing up of the testimony submitted at that time; but I felt that in calling upon the Senate to reopen this case a backward glance over the important material facts upon which the Senate did pass was necessary and proper.

I briefly reviewed the case from the beginning down to the time when the Senate entered its judgment, by a vote of 46 to 40, in favor of the sitting Member.

I believed then, Mr. President, that this judgment was wrong. I believed that it would not stand. Senators may remember that when request was made here on one occasion to fix a time for a vote in the Lorimer case, I objected, and said I had reason for doing so.

I believed, Mr. President, that all the testimony in this case had not been secured. I am now sure, Mr. President, that all the testimony in this case had not been taken at that time, and I am equally sure that all the testimony in this case has not yet been recorded in any forum. I remember saying a few moments before a vote was taken, that this case would come back again to this Senate. I felt sure of that; and it is here to-day; and I am here, Mr. President, to ask that the Lorimer case be reopened.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the people of the State particularly interested, the State of Illinois, and the people of the whole country, did not accept the judgment which we entered on the 1st day of March last. They rejected it at once with almost one voice. From all over the country protests came against the action of the Senate.

Mr. President, nothing is ever really settled until it is rightly settled. It may seem to be settled. We may think in our imperfect human way that we have disposed of it, but it will come back to confront us. It is God's law of everlasting righteousness demanding judgment. As the law of gravity always pulls to make things plumb, so the eternal law of right goes on and on forever, exercising its tremendous, unending, immutable decree that right shall prevail.

Following the decision which we entered in this case, I gathered together as best I could the public opinion of this country as recorded in the public press of the country. I caused to be clipped from every paper that could be reached the comment upon the action of the Senate. I did it, Mr. President, with a view of presenting it here. I have it. I can not present it without violating the rule of the Senate which provides that there shall be nothing uttered in debate which "directly or indirectly by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator."

Sir, out of 117 editorials representing leading papers in all sections of the country there is not one that does not reflect most severely upon the action of the Senate in the Lorimer case and upon the motives of many Senators who voted to confirm LORIMER's title to a seat in this body. In view of the rule I merely call attention to the fact that the judgment of the Senate was not in accord with the judgment of the press.

Mr. President, I know that Senators—some Senators have expressed from time to time a feeling of indifference as to public opinion. Now, I do not think this great body ought to yield its judgment to any spasmodic manifestation of temper which may sweep over this country, but, Mr. President, taken by and large, public opinion in this country is right; public opinion is conservative, and I think it would be well for the Senate of the United States to look at itself from time to time in that great mirror, public opinion.

We complain sometimes here because we think that the so-called muckraking and uplift magazines and reform criticism present to the public a distorted and imperfect characterization of the Senate of the United States. But, Mr. President, for my part, I never have had any fear of the criticism magazines or newspapers may make of this body. I never have believed that it is possible for them to make any lasting impression as to the character of the Senate unless they print the exact truth about the Senate. That is the only thing the Senate need be apprehensive about.

What may be said outside of this Chamber, Mr. President, is not important excepting as it is a record of comment upon what actually transpires in this Chamber. What we ourselves, as Senators, do is important. What the newspapers and magazines say we do is of no consequence unless it be true. Then, sir, it is vitally important, because it is the basis for a real, lasting public opinion. And so I say, Mr. President, that the well-considered judgment of the press and the periodicals of this country on public men and public affairs goes to the making of the history of the country, and, taken as a whole, this collective editorial judgment of the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives and the administrative officers of Government is generally in accord with what they deserve.

I am here to ask the Senate of the United States to reconsider this judgment, to reopen this "Lorimer case." I do not believe I need cite any authority. I will, however, bring to your attention the case of HENRY A. DU PONT, of Delaware, Senate Election Cases, page 873, where, in a report made, in which Gray and Turpie and Pugh and Palmer and Hoar and Chandler and Pritchard and Burrows joined, I find this:

> We do not doubt that the Senate, like other courts, may review its own judgments where new evidence has been discovered, or where, by reason of fraud or accident, it appears that the judgment ought to be reviewed. The remedy which in other courts may be given by writs of review or error or bills of review may doubtless be given here by a simple vote reversing the first adjudication. We have no doubt that a legal doctrine involved in a former judgment of the Senate may be overruled in later cases.

Now, Mr. President, I am prepared to offer to the Senate reasons why this judgment should be reopened, why the Senate should review the findings that it made in the Lorimer case on the 1st of March.

The majority report of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, made in December to the Senate, approved the title of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in this body. That was an announcement to the people of the country, and particularly to the people of Illinois, which, I suppose, led them to believe that this committee would do all in its power in this Chamber to give validity to the title of WILLIAM LORIMER to a place here as the representative of the State of Illinois.

Mr. President, acting upon that information and that belief, they proceeded to organize in the Senate of the Illinois Legislature an investigation of their own. Manifestly they were not ready, sir, to accept the judgment of that committee; they did not believe that WILLIAM LORIMER ought to represent that great State on this floor. So, on the 17th day of January, 1911, the Illinois State Senate adopted the following resolution:

> Whereas certain official misconduct on the part of certain members of the senate has been charged, wherein it is alleged that certain senators have violated their oaths of office in that they have knowingly and intentionally paid, contributed, or received something, or have made or received some promise or promises, in the nature of a bribe, with intent to influence, directly or indirectly, the official action of a member or members of the general assembly: Now, therefore,
> Resolved, That the committee heretofore appointed, consisting of Senators Helm, Hay, McKenzie, Ettelson, and Burton, are hereby authorized, directed, and empowered to investigate and report to the senate concerning the alleged acts of bribery and official misconduct of members of this or the preceding general assembly.
> And in reference to such investigation said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for and subpœna persons to appear before it as witnesses and to compel such witnesses to testify, and to compel the production of documents and other papers; to administer oaths, to take testimony, and to employ, in its discretion, if it deems it essential, counsel, a clerk, stenographer, and other assistants; and
> All processes issued by the chairman of said committee shall be served by the sergeant at arms of the senate or his assistants.
> And said committee shall meet at such times and places as shall best serve its purposes.
> Further resolved, That the members of said committee shall be allowed their actual traveling expenses, and any persons employed to assist the committee shall be paid reasonable compensation out of the appropriations made by the senate.
> Further resolved, That this resolution be entered nunc pro tunc, as and for Senate Resolution No. 5.

Pursuant to that resolution, Mr. President, the senate committee of the Illinois Legislature organized and began its work of investigation. I want to take the time of the Senate to place before it so much of the results of that investigation as, it seems to me, has a material bearing upon the reopening of this case.

It appears, Mr. President, that one of the Chicago newspapers, the Record-Herald, had charged specifically in an editorial that a fund had been raised to purchase votes to secure the election of Mr. LORIMER to the Senate of the United States. The publication of the editorial led the Illinois senate committee to summon the editor of that paper.

Let me inject a word of explanation here, Mr. President. I requested that certified copies of the minutes of the testimony, taken by the committee, be furnished to me. I have before me here all the record evidence taken by that committee, except, I believe, that of the first session, containing the testimony of the editor of the Chicago Record-Herald, Mr. Kohlsaat, on the occasion of his first appearance as a witness before that committee, March 29, 1911. It was brief. I therefore state, as best I can from the press accounts, in substance, the testimony given on that occasion by Mr. Kohlsaat.

Summoned before the committee, he was asked to state upon what information he had published, editorially, the statement that a fund of $100,000 had been raised and expended to bring about the election of WILLIAM LORIMER. Mr. Kohlsaat refused to answer. He told the committee he had been informed that such a fund had been raised. When asked for the name of his informant, however, he declined to give it upon the ground that the information had been received in the strictest confidence and that he could not, without violating that confidence, make the disclosure. The committee then adjourned, after requesting Mr. Kohlsaat to reconsider the matter and reappear at a later meeting of the committee. Before the next meeting, Mr. Kohlsaat telegraphed the chairman of the committee that he had been released from his pledge of confidence and could, if desired, give the name of his informant. The committee called on Mr. Kohlsaat to name the man. Mr. Kohlsaat then appeared and testified that he had received his information from Mr. Funk, the general manager, I believe, of the International Harvester Co.

Mr. Funk, upon being called before the committee, testified to a conversation with one Edward Hines, of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. This conversation between Mr. Funk and Edward Hines had taken place shortly after WILLIAM LORIMER had been elected United States Senator. Mr. Funk testified that he met Mr. Hines in the Union League Club of Chicago; that Hines stopped Funk as he was coming down from the lunch room and talked to him in the lounging room. The following, in so far as I quote at all, is Mr. Funk's statement of the conversation:

> He (Hines) said I was just the fellow he had been looking for or trying to see, and said he wanted to talk to me a minute. So we went and sat down on one of the leather couches there on the side of the room, and without any preliminaries, and quite as a matter of course, he said, "Well, we put LORIMER over down at Springfield, but it cost us about a hundred thousand dollars to do it." Then he went on to say that they had had to act quickly when the time came; that they had had no chance to consult anyone beforehand. I think his words were these: "We had to act quickly when the time came, so we put up the money." Then he said, "We—now we are seeing some of our friends so as to get it fixed up." He says they had advanced the money, that they were now seeing several people, whom they thought would be interested, to get them to reimburse them. I asked him why he came to us. I said, "Why do you come to us?" meaning the Harvester Co. He said, "Well, you people are just as much interested as any of us in having the right kind of a man at Washington." "Well," I said. I think I replied and said, "We won't have anything to do with that matter at all." He said, "Why not?" I said, "Simply because we are not in that sort of business." And we had some aimless discussion back and forth, and I remember I asked him how much he was getting from his different friends. He said, "Well, of course, we can only go to a few big people; but if about 10 of us will put up $10,000 apiece that will clean it up." That is the substance of the conversation.

With some reluctance Mr. Funk testified that Hines told him to "send the money to Ed Tilden."

Within a day or two after this conversation with Hines Mr. Funk reported what Hines had said to both Mr. Cyrus H.

McCormick, president of the International Harvester Co., and to Edgar A. Bancroft, general counsel for the Harvester Co. Mr. McCormick said, "Good; I am very glad you turned him down promptly."

I think it was something like a year after this conversation with Hines and shortly after the publication of Assemblyman White's exposure of the Lorimer bribery matter that Funk informed Kohlsaat of what Hines had said to him, but Mr. Funk, as shown by the testimony, was very prompt in reporting what had taken place between himself and Hines to the principal officials of his company.

In February, 1911, Mr. Hines came to Mr. Funk's office. This was a day or two after an editorial appeared in the Chicago Record-Herald making specific reference to a $100,000 corruption fund.

Mark this: After Mr. Hines had made this statement to Mr. Funk and Mr. Funk had reported it to the president and the general counsel of the company for which he worked, after months had passed by and the country was stirred by disclosures in the Lorimer case, Mr. Funk had met Mr. Kohlsaat and said to him, in substance, "I know there was a great fund raised; at least, I was asked to make a contribution of $10,000 to help make up a hundred thousand dollar fund that was used in this case." That gave rise to the publication of this editorial, and the publication of the editorial in February, 1911—just last February—gave Mr. Hines, for the first time, notice that his talk about pulling off LORIMER's election had found its way into the public prints. This made him uneasy.

Now, see what he did. Sitting around me here this afternoon are many lawyers who will at once recognize Mr. Hines's next step as indicative of the man who is fearful of being caught. He hustles about to see whether he can not in some way correct—not correct, but pervert—the recollection of the men with whom he had perhaps been careless in his conversation. See what Hines did. I quote now from the testimony of Mr. Funk:

Q. What conversation did you have with him [Hines] upon that occasion?—A. Well, he was very much disturbed at that time and undertook to refresh my memory as to what our conversation had been. * * * I can not repeat his language exactly, but in substance it was to the effect that his former conversation with me had been merely a general discussion of the situation down there, and that he had not asked me for any money, and that he did not know anything about any money having been raised. * * *

The trick is an old one. You will observe Mr. Hines resorting to this same practice, which is the mark of guilt always, at other stages in this case:

Q. And did he pretend to have any other business or any other thing to discuss with you when he came to your office in February, 1911?—A. No.

Mr. President, how indicative that is of the guilty mind. The moment Hines saw that publication he began to think of the men with whom he had conversed upon this subject, with whom he had been somewhat boastful, perhaps, as it appears he was on some occasions when he was not looking for contributions, and he began to think of the men to whom he had gone to secure contributions. He remembered that this man, Mr. Funk, general manager of the Harvester Co., was one of the men to whom he had applied. We have not the testimony, but I have no doubt that Hines took the back track and visited as promptly as possible all other men with whom he had talked and to whom he had gone for contributions. The editorial in the Chicago Record-Herald was proof positive to Hines that there had been a "leak" somewhere.

Mr. OWEN. The editorial did not mention him?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; it did not mention Mr. Hines; it did not mention any name; it just stated that it was known that a $100,000 fund had been raised to elect LORIMER—a plainly libelous editorial if it were not true. But Mr. Hines immediately hastens to Mr. Funk and says, "Now, you remember we had a talk, and about all I said was so and so and so and so," and he attempts to blur the recollection of this man as to that conversation. I say the trick is an old one. Any man who has had experience in trial work will recognize it at once. You will find it running all the way through this case. O Mr. President, this is one of the plainest cases that I have ever reviewed. I ask you to listen for a moment to a brief reference to the testimony of another witness.

Mr. Herman H. Hettler, of the Hettler Lumber Co., admitted having had some conversation with Edward Hines in reference to the senatorial election of 1909 at the Union League Club. (Employees of the club were present and in a position to hear what transpired.) He met Hines by the cigar stand in the outer hall by accident:

I stepped into the Union League Club on the day of the election just mentioned. I was about to buy some cigars, as I was leaving that day for Toronto. I was leaning over the cigar case talking with the cigar man and making the selections when—rather intent—when some one touched me on the shoulder, and turning around, I saw it was Mr. Hines, who was very enthusiastic, and apparently in a happy frame of mind, and stated, "Do you know the name of your new Senator?" * * * I looked at him before I made any reply, and he says, "I just come out of the telephone booth, just a minute," pointing to the booth, "I have just been talking to him." He says, "LORIMER has been elected. And," he says, "I am feeling very happy over it," which was plain to be seen by his actions. He says, "I elected him. I did it myself personally."

Now, I take you for a moment to some facts which developed on a railroad train. William Burgess, of Duluth, Minn., manager and treasurer of the Burgess Electrical Co., testified that in March, 1911, he was present at a conversation on the Winnipeg Flyer, a train running between Duluth and Virginia, Minn., at which was discussed "the election of an Illinois Senator." This conversation occurred in the smoking room of the Winnipeg sleeper. A man named Johnson, of the Northwestern Lumberman; Rudolph Weyerhaeuser; John Weyerhaeuser; and "I think" Carl Weyerhaeuser; Samuel J. Cusson, manager of the Virginia & Rainy Lake Lumber Co.; and C. F. Wiehe were in the smoking compartment on that trip. The C. F. Wiehe referred to is secretary of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. and the brother-in-law of Hines.

Now, I quote from Mr. Burgess's testimony:

A. I can not remember how the conversation started in regard to the election of Mr. LORIMER any more than I made some remark disparaging to Mr. LORIMER's election—

These men were grouped about in the smoking compartment and fell into conversation. This Lorimer case was in all the papers. It was most natural that it should come up in that casual meeting—

What that remark was I do not remember. And Mr. Wiehe immediately took the cudgel up and wanted to know what I knew about Mr. LORIMER's election, and I told him that the only thing that I knew about Mr. LORIMER's election was what I had read in the papers. He wanted to know if I got my information from the—I think he said the Chicago Record—Record-Herald—whatever the paper is—

Perhaps he said the Chicago Tribune; I do not know—

I told him no; that I got it from the local papers in Duluth, the Evening Herald and News-Tribune, and the Chicago Examiner; and he made the remark that I "did not know very damn much about it." And the conversation started, and he made—I told him that it was credited around the country that Mr. LORIMER had used a considerable amount of money to secure his election, and he said that Mr. LORIMER had not used a dollar of his own money for his election. And the conversation kept on. He started in to tell me how Mr. LORIMER was elected, and finally he made this statement: "There was a jack pot raised to elect Mr. LORIMER; I know what I am talking about, because I subscribed $10,000 to it myself."

Mr. OWEN. A brother-in-law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A brother-in-law of Mr. Edward Hines.

Now, it is not any bolder or more audacious than a dozen statements made by Edward Hines that will be proven by a score of witnesses if this case is ever reopened and tried by the Senate.

Q. Was anything said about the General Assembly of Illinois in that conversation?—A. He did make this remark that it was impossible to get anything of merit through the Illinois Legislature without the use of money.

Burgess testified that the only one of the persons whom he named as being on that train, who was present during his conversation with Wiehe, was a young man from Regina, Canadian Northwest, with whom Burgess got into conversation after Wiehe left the smoking compartment, but whose name Burgess did not remember.

Burgess repeated his conversation with Wiehe the next day to two men; one of them was Mr. Bailey—W. T. Bailey, a lumberman from Duluth, who was in the lumber business at Virginia—and the other was Mr. W. H. Cook.

Mr. Burgess testified:

I went into the hotel that night, and when I asked Mr. Bailey who this gentleman (Wiehe) was, he told me. I told him about the conversation I had on the train.

When Burgess left Virginia on the Winnipeg Flyer the following Wednesday morning, he repeated Mr. Wiehe's statement about the $10,000 contribution to the Lorimer election fund to a Mr. Cook.

There appeared before this committee, at the request of Mr. Wiehe, two or three of the gentlemen who were on that train; friends whom he called to sustain him in his statement that he did not have such a conversation with Mr. Burgess. If this case is ever reopened, and Mr. Burgess comes before a Senate committee to testify, I have no doubt, from information which has come to me, as to the reliability which the Senate will attach to Mr. Burgess's testimony.

B. A. Johnson, of Chicago, for 25 years general staff representative of the American Lumberman, a newspaper, testified that he was in the smoking compartment of the Winnipeg Flyer on the night mentioned in Burgess's testimony, when Wiehe talked to Burgess about the "slop fund." He went into the compartment soon after the train left Duluth, smoked a cigar, and left after finishing his smoke, which was in about "25 or 30 minutes." When asked who was in the compartment when he left, he replied: "A gentleman whom I afterwards learned was William Burgess."

He testified that Mr. Wiehe had telegraphed to him to come to Springfield to testify regarding what took place that night on the Winnipeg Flyer and said he did not hear any conversation in that smoking compartment about the Lorimer matter by anybody; that Mr. Wiehe left the compartment before he did and was not seen again by Johnson, who testified he "looked for" Wiehe on the train. "It was not idle curiosity; it was a matter of cold business." Johnson did not leave his seat in the sleeper, he admitted, although "looking for" Wiehe.

He testified that he left that smoking compartment, went into the sleeper, took a seat about the center of the sleeper, and watched for Mr. Wiehe.

I think it will appear in this connection, from other witnesses whom Wiehe called to sustain him in his denial, that Johnson is not telling the truth.

S. J. Cusson, general manager of the Virginia & Rainy Lake Lumber Co., testified that he was on the Winnipeg Flyer on the night in question with the Hines-Weyerhauser-Wiehe crowd. His testimony as to the length of time he was in the smoking compartment is vague and confused. He saw Burgess and Wiehe sitting near each other and facing each other.

Q. * * * and you heard no conversation in there about the Lorimer matter?—A. None at all.

Mr. Cusson was not in the committee room during the examination of Mr. Johnson. Mr. Helm, chairman of the committee, had asked that witnesses who had not yet testified retire to another room. Cusson did not therefore hear Johnson's testimony about his efforts to find Mr. Wiehe, after he had left the smoking compartment, in order to discuss "business matters" with him. Cusson's testimony on this point contradicts Johnson's testimony. Johnson testified that when he left the smoking compartment he went back into the sleeper—same car—and sat down in a seat near the middle and "played it both ways"—that is, watched both ends to make sure that Wiehe did not enter the car without his knowledge.

A pretty handy witness, you see; a fellow who was looking "both ways."

Said Johnson:

I was not successful in seeing Mr. Wiehe—after he left the smoking compartment—until the next evening at 8 o'clock, in Virginia.

You see the purpose of this testimony is to get Wiehe out of the way, out of the smoking compartment, so that he could not possibly have had this conversation with Mr. Burgess—that is, if Johnson is telling the truth, which he is not.

Johnson responded to this line of questioning evasively, bringing from Chairman Helm the admonition, "Don't argue; answer the question."

On this point, coming back now to Cusson's testimony, Cusson testified as follows, directly contradicting Johnson:

Q. Do you mean to say, Mr. Cusson, that when you came out of the smoking compartment into the body of the car that Mr. Wiehe was there?—A. I do.

Now Johnson, you recall, says Wiehe did not appear in the car that evening. Clearly, Johnson was framing the story so Wiehe could not possibly have gone into the smoking compartment again to resume this conversation with Burgess. Johnson was playing a strong hand. Whereupon comes Mr. Cusson, who had not heard Mr. Johnson's testimony on this subject, saying that when he had gone out into the sleeping car Mr. Wiehe was there.

Q. And he remained there until you arrived at Virginia?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you talk with him?—A. Yes, sir. * * *
Q. How far apart were Johnson and Wiehe when you came out of the compartment?—A. Oh, I don't know as I could say just where Mr. Johnson sat.
Q. Well, assuming that he sat in the middle of the car, how far was Mr. Wiehe away from where Johnson sat?—A. Two or three seats.
Q. Forward or backward?—A. Forward.
Q. In front of him, so that he was in plain view of Mr. Johnson all the time?—A. Yes, sir.

James H. Harper, of the insurance firm of Harper, Shields & Co., of Duluth, carrying fire insurance for lumber concerns with which Mr. Hines is associated and a stockholder in the Virginia & Rainy Lake Lumber Co., of which Mr. Hines is president, was another witness called in this case. Harper testified that he was on the Winnipeg Flyer on the night in question, but that at no time during the trip was he in the smoking compartment. He looked into the smoking compartment as he came into the car, greeted Mr. Wiehe, who was inside, and "noticed in there at that time Mr. Johnson, a Mr. Burgess, and Mr. Fred Weyerhaeuser, and there were some others I did not notice particularly, because I just looked for an instant."

Harper testified that about half an hour later Mr. Wiehe came out of the smoking compartment into the main part of the car. This also directly contradicts Johnson's testimony.

Q. Well, how long did he remain there?—A. Well, he was there—oh, I suppose he and I were together possibly an hour, the rest of the time.
Q. In the main part of the car?—A. Yes, sir. * * *
Q. So that, so far as your observation went, Mr. Wiehe was in that same car during that entire trip?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did not leave the car, in other words?—A. Not to my knowledge; no. * * *
Q. Where did Mr. Wiehe sit with reference to the seat occupied by Mr. Johnson and the man with whom he was talking?—A. Well, when he was with me he was down near the end of the car, next to the smoker, where my seat was.
Q. And when he left you, then he went up to the other end of the car?—A. Yes, sir; as I remember it.
Q. And stood there and talked with those other men whom you mentioned?—A. I think he sat in with them.
Q. So that he was about one section removed from Mr. Johnson and the men he was talking with?—A. Well, I think they were perhaps right across the aisle.
Q. Yes; within comparatively a few feet of each other?—A. Yes.

Now, Mr. President, I quote from the testimony of Mr. Wiehe himself.

Mr. Christian F. Wiehe, of Chicago, secretary and a director of the Edward Hines Lumber Co., testified that he was in the smoking compartment of the Winnipeg sleeper on the night in question and remained there "25 or 30 minutes."

Although denying he told anyone he had contributed $10,000 to the Lorimer fund, Mr. Wiehe admitted, and I quote now his exact words:

I may have talked into a conversation. I may have talked there. I would not say I did not or did.

Mr. W. H. Cook, of Duluth, stockholder in the Virginia & Rainy Lake Lumber Co., of which Edward Hines is president, testified that he was on the Winnipeg Flyer on the night in question. He did not see Mr. Burgess on the train, but about 11 o'clock next morning, at Virginia, he met Mr. Burgess and talked with him.

Q. What was that conversation?—A. Why, he came up to me and asked me who that—he said, "What do you call that fellow with the short, black whiskers, one of the Hines gang?" "Oh," I said, "do you refer to Mr. Wiehe?" He said, "Yes; that is the fellow." He said, "He is a funny fellow. He talks too much."

Now, mark you, that was the next morning.

Q. He said he talked too much?—A. Yes.
Q. Anything else said?—A. Oh, he said he was talking about the Lorimer election up there, and money, and one thing and another. I did not pay much attention to what he did say.

I cite that as showing what was in Mr. Burgess's mind—the impression that had been made upon him by this talk with Wiehe in the smoking compartment.

Mr. Cook testified further that he has known Edward Hines for some 10 years; that in the month of May, 1909, shortly before the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, he had a conversation with Edward Hines at the Grand Pacific Hotel, in Chicago, in the presence of Mr. Henry Turrish, of Duluth, who is in the lumber business in Oregon.

I think it is fair to say at this point that Mr. Cook and Mr. Hines have had some business troubles. The following is from Mr. Cook's testimony:

A. Mr. Hines was going through the lobby—this was in the Grand Pacific Hotel—and he saw Mr. Turrish and myself standing there. He stopped and spoke to us. Mr. Turrish asked him how he was getting on down in Washington. "Oh," he said, "I am having a hell of a time." He said, "Now, there is—for instance," he said, "there is old STEPHENSON," he said, "after I elected him he has gone down to Washington and started working there for free lumber." He said, "I had a terrible time getting him lined up." Then he went on and told about what a time he had with the southern Democrats. He said he would have them all fixed up to-day and to-morrow they would flop, and he would have to go and fix them all over again.
Q. What else, if anything, was said at that conversation?—A. Mr. Turrish asked him how they were getting along down here with the senatorial deadlock. "Well," he said, "it is all fixed." He said, "I will tell you confidentially LORIMER will be the next Senator." He said, "We had Boutell fixed for the senatorship. He had promised to work to keep the $2 tariff on lumber, but," he said, "when the lumber schedule came up before the Ways and Means Committee he was working for free lumber." He said, "I immediately took it up with Senator Aldrich, and we decided that we had to have another man, a man we could depend on. It was decided that I should have a talk with LORIMER. I did. LORIMER has agreed to stand pat. He will listen to reason. I have got it all fixed; he will be the next Senator from Illinois." That was the substance of the conversation.

Mr. Cook testified to another conversation with Mr. Hines subsequent to this, "somewhere about" the 24th or 25th of the same month—May, 1909. Mr. Cook and Mr. O'Brien, of St. Paul, had arranged with either Mr. Wiehe or Mr. Baker, of the Hines Lumber Co., for a conference with Hines at the Grand Pacific Hotel. Hines kept the appointment.

As soon as Hines came into the hotel Cook met him in the lobby. After asking for the number of Cook's room he said he had talked over the long-distance telephone and would go up to Cook's room and attend to it there.

Q. Well, did he subsequently come to your room?—A. Yes. I got him—my room was on the parlor floor and Mr. O'Brien's was up on either the second or third floor, and my room was easiest to get at, and we went up and—well, Mr. Hines went in and put in a long-distance call, and then we all went to my room. * * *

Q. Well, now, what happened after you got in your room?—A. Why, we were in the room for a short time—some, probably, three or four minutes. The phone rang. I went to the phone. The operator, I suppose, asked if Mr. Hines was there. I said, "Yes." She says, "Here is Springfield for him; here is the governor." I called Hines to the phone.

Now, there will appear some contradictions in this testimony as to just whom Hines talked with at that time. I will later undertake to demonstrate that he talked with LORIMER. As is suggested to me by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the use of the word "governor" might have been prearranged. I will prove with the aid of Hines's own testimony that he talked with LORIMER, and talked about money and about "putting it over," and so I ask Senators to follow me closely.

Now, mark you, they are in the room of Cook on the second floor of the Grand Pacific Hotel. O'Brien is there; Cook is there; Hines is there; and Hines's brother-in-law, Wiehe, is there.

Q. Did you hear the conversation which he had on the telephone that morning?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you tell the committee what it was as you remember it?—A. Hines took the receiver out of my hand, and he spoke in the phone. He asked, "Hello, hello, hello. Hello, is this you, governor?" He said, "Well, I just left President Taft and Senator Aldrich last night in Washington. Now, they tell me that under no consideration shall Hopkins be returned to the Senate. Now, I will be down on the next train. Don't leave anything undone. I will be down on this next train, prepared to furnish all the money that is required. Now, don't stop at anything; don't leave anything undone; I will be down on the next train," or words to that effect—repeated it over three or four times.

Q. And who was present in the room during that conversation besides you and Mr. Hines?—A. William O'Brien and either Mr. Wiehe or Mr. Baker; I am not positive which.

About a year afterwards, in May or June, 1910, Mr. Cook received a visit from Mr. C. F. Wiehe, who came to him at Mr. Hines's request. Mr. O'Brien was present during this conversation between Mr. Wiehe and Mr. Cook. At 12 o'clock midnight Mr. Wiehe came to the Grand Pacific Hotel.

Q. Well, tell the committee what occurred when Mr. Wiehe came to the hotel that night about midnight.—A. Mr. O'Brien and I had been to a theater. We came back to the hotel shortly after 11 o'clock, and sat down and had a smoke. And we smoked there for some time, finally burned up a couple of cigars, and I says, "Bill, it is about time to go to bed," and I looked at the clock, and it was just 12 o'clock. He says "I guess that is right," he says, "we had better go to bed." We were just about starting for bed and Mr. Wiehe came in. He seemed to be very anxious that we should get out of town; told us if we did not get out of town that night they would have us before the grand jury the next morning. He said that Hines had called him up out of bed and told him to get down and see us; LORIMER had called him—that is, Hines—and told him that we were in town, and "for God's sake to get us out."

Q. Do you remember anything else that occurred at that time?—A. Yes. We had—Mr. Wiehe sat down after a while, and we had a little further conversation. I think Mr. O'Brien made the remark that "the papers seem to be chasing Hines pretty hard"; and Wiehe says, "Yes, ha, ha, they will get him." He says, "Hines talks too much." He says, "All the office force gets there from daylight to dark is, 'Keep still, keep still, keep still; don't say a word,' then," and he says, "Every damned newspaper reporter that comes along, Hines will give him two columns." * * *

[Laughter.]

Mr. O'Brien asked Wiehe how—he says, "How do you expect we are going to get out of here this time of night; no train leaving here now?" And there were some further remarks about certain people not being very scared of the grand jury, even if they were pulled up. That was about all. * * *

Q. How did Mr. Wiehe act on that occasion?—A. Well, he was considerably excited when he first came in.

Q. Did he say that he had come from his home to see you gentlemen purposely in order to convey this message?—A. Well, he said Mr. Hines had called him up out of bed.

Mr. Cook further testified that he met Mr. Hines about two or three weeks after this midnight visit of Mr. Wiehe's. This time he met Hines by appointment in the office of William E. McCordic, who is Mr. Cook's Chicago attorney.

Q. Well, did you have a talk with Mr. Hines on that occasion?—A. Yes; Mr. Hines came down there to see Mr. Davis and Mr. McCordic and myself about some exchange of some bonds that we were interested in. After our business was concluded Mr. Hines and I went down together. As soon as we got out into the hall Hines spoke to me about a story that was going around to the effect, or purporting to be something similar to, the conversation which he carried on over the long-distance phone from my room in the hotel about a year previous. He says, "Now, this story comes from some telephone operator, some girl," he says, "and they have got it all mixed up"; says he, "the way they have got it is that I was talking from your office in Duluth with ex-Gov. Yates at Springfield, wherein I told him I would be down on the next train prepared to furnish a million dollars to elect LORIMER." "Now," he says, "you know that was not Yates at all I was talking with." He says, "It was Deneen"—

Fixing up another witness's memory, you see—

And then he went on to caution me about keeping very quiet about such a story, or about the conversation he held there. He said if it ever came out that it would be betraying the confidence that President Taft and Senator Aldrich put in him; that he never could go back to Washington; he never could look either of those gentlemen in the face again, and that it would compromise some of the best people in the city of Chicago and the State of Minnesota.

Cook told the committee that he had discussed Hines's telephone conversation with Mr. O'Brien, of St. Paul, and that there was no difference at all between his remembrance of what took place and what Mr. O'Brien remembered about it except the single matter as to whether it was Gov. Deneen that Hines was talking with over the phone or ex-Gov. Yates.

It does not make any difference; any governor was good enough for Hines to use as a cover for LORIMER.

Mr. Cook further testified that he had had some business controversies with Mr. Hines, but that such matters would in no way cause him to testify to anything that was untrue or to color any of his statements to the detriment of Mr. Hines.

In further corroboration of these conversations with Hines and Wiehe, Mr. Cook testified that he had repeated all of them to his attorney, Mr. McCordic, and also to Mr. Washburn and Mr. Bailey, his attorneys in Duluth, soon after they occurred.

Now, of course, this Illinois committee, in conducting its investigations, was limited by State lines, and whenever it heard of any witnesses outside it was necessary to send some messenger or employee of the committee to interview them and ask them if they would come before the committee and testify. For this purpose the Illinois senate employed Mr. M. B. Coan.

Mr. Coan testified that he went to St. Paul to interview Mr. William O'Brien. What Mr. O'Brien said to Coan is in direct contradiction of Mr. Hines's statement that he had not talked about money in the Lorimer election to anyone. Mr. Coan's account of what O'Brien told him is as follows:

He (O'Brien) said he was mixed up in a deal with the Weyerhausers and Hines, and he did not think it would be to his advantage to come down here and testify; that he felt that his testimony might convict Mr. Hines of perjury to this committee; that he believed Mr. Hines had testified that he had not spoken to anyone in regard to the money used in connection with the election of Mr. LORIMER; and that he had told him he—he had had talks with him about it.

O'Brien also told Coan that W. H. Cook's testimony concerning Hines's telephone conversation from the Grand Pacific Hotel to a person he addressed as "governor" was entirely correct, except that O'Brien differed with Cook as to who was on the other end of the telephone. O'Brien was of the opinion that it was ex-Gov. Yates to whom Hines was talking, while Cook thought it was Gov. Deneen.

Regarding Cook's statement that Mr. Wiehe came to the Grand Pacific Hotel and asked Cook and O'Brien to get out of town before the grand jury could call them, "and so forth," O'Brien said to Coan, "Why, they can't deny it; they know it is true; they won't deny it."

Coan further testified that in the capacity of investigator for the committee he visited Marquette and interviewed Frank J. Russell, editor of the Mining Journal; E. V. Mosier, deputy United States marshal; and a reporter named Lowe on the Mining Journal, in reference to the Illinois senatorial election. He also talked with Shelly B. Jones, druggist, and Rush Culver, lumberman and lawyer, of L'Anse, Mich.

Mr. Jones stated to Mr. Coan that he had some information with reference to the Illinois senatorial election. Mr. Coan said:

He (Jones) told me that * * * in the early part of 1909 Edward Hines, who was dealing with him and his brother-in-law (Rush Culver) and Edward Culver in lumber from the Northern Lumber Co., in which they were both interested, came to Marquette, and they were out that evening and having a few drinks, and either in the Marquette Hotel or in a saloon called Bush's saloon, he could not remember which, he said Mr. Hines began telling him the history of his life—a synopsis of it—how he rose from a poor boy to becoming a very prominent lumberman, and he concluded by saying that he had just succeeded in making a United States Senator that had cost a hundred thousand dollars, and that it was well worth it; that he would stand for a high duty on lumber, and that the lumber trade needed such a man in Washington. That is about all he said.

Mr. Jones stated to Mr. Coan that at the time of this conversation with Hines his brother-in-law, Rush Culver, was present. This statement was made by Mr. Jones to other persons in and about Marquette.

Mr. Coan, during this visit to Marquette, on or about April 9, also talked with Mr. Rush Culver, lawyer and lumberman. He met him at his house in L'Anse and asked him about this conversation. Mr. Coan said:

He (Culver) said that he and Hines were very good friends, and that he did not want to say anything that would get Mr. Hines into any trouble; that he had talked with Mr. Hines a number of times about Senator LORIMER and his political affiliations; that Hines had spoken to him about financing LORIMER'S campaign, and perhaps for Congress and otherwise, and he said that he was not clear as to just when this conversation had taken place; he thought it was perhaps before his last conversation with Hines on the campaign contribution; he said he thought it was in 1907. Then he called in his son, Harry Culver, and he asked him when it was that the Northern Lumber Co. had sold Hines a lot of hardwood culls, whatever they are, and his son said that it was in the summer before he left college, and he left college in 1910, which made it the summer of 1909. And he placed that as nearly as he thought he could—the date when he talked with Hines. * * * He said Mr. Hines talked very candidly to him and he talked frankly to him.

Frank J. Russell, a resident of Marquette, made affidavit as follows:

That on or about the 6th day of April, A. D. 1911, in the city of Marquette, I went to see Shelly E. Jones, of said city, in his place of business and asked him if he was a party to a conversation with Edward Hines, of the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a United States Senator from Illinois. To this question Jones replied, in substance, that Hines had said in the course of the conversation referred to, "We put LORIMER over. It cost us a lot of money to do it, but he is well worth the price. I handled the stuff."

On the following day Russell again discussed the matter with Jones, and Jones again repeated his statement, saying that the remarks made by Hines about LORIMER'S election grew out of a discussion of the lumber tariff, Hines saying that LORIMER was a high lumber-tariff man and that was why he was a good man to have in the United States Senate.

Russell stated further that in this conversation Jones also said:

Have within a week called this conversation to the attention of Rush Culver, who was also present, and he told me that he remembered it.

I suppose these gentlemen were reminded of Hines's former statement by the testimony which the investigation by the Illinois Senate committee was bringing out at that time and was then the subject of general newspaper comment.

A witness, Mr. Bergener, was present at this conversation. That witness was present, of course, at Mr. Coan's instance, because, I assume, he was directed to have somebody present when he interviewed these witnesses in other States who could not be persuaded to respond to a subpœna.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to try to conclude to-night?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will be impossible, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, for me to conclude to-night. I would be perfectly willing to continue as long as the Senate cares to sit. I regret that I did not get started earlier to-day. I was completing my analysis of this testimony. There are some 600 pages of this testimony. I have put some time upon it in order to present it to the Senate, as I consider it important.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will, and with the statement that I should like to go on as early to-morrow as possible and complete what I have to submit to the Senate if I can.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 24, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 23, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, before whom millions daily prostrate themselves in adoration and praise, we humbly and reverently bow in Thy presence and acknowledge with unfeigned gratitude our indebtedness to Thee for all things; and we most humbly and fervently pray that Thou wilt continue Thy blessings unto us, to uphold, sustain, and guide us, that we may fulfill to the uttermost our mission in this life and be fully prepared at the proper time to enter upon that other life where we shall serve Thee in a world without end, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RATIFICATION OF THE INCOME TAX.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the secretary of state of Colorado, inclosing a joint resolution of the Legislature of Colorado ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States authorizing an income tax:

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Colorado, ss:

I, James B. Pearce, secretary of state of the State of Colorado, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of senate concurrent resolution 3, which was filed in this office the 21st day of February, A. D. 1911, at 5.43 o'clock p. m., and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Colorado, at the city of Denver, this 20th day of May, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL.] JAMES B. PEARCE, Secretary of State.
By THOMAS F. DILLON, Jr., Deputy.

Senate concurrent resolution 3, ratifying the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

Whereas both Houses of the Sixty-first Congress of the United States of America at its first session, by a constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof, made the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States of America in the following words, to wit:

"Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution, namely:

"'ART. XVI. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.'"

Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, That the said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, ratified by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado.

That certified copies of this preamble and joint resolution be forwarded by the governor of this State to the President of the United States, Secretary of State of the United States, to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives.

STEPHEN R. FITZGARRALD,
President of the Senate.
GEORGE MCLACHLAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved this 20th day of February, A. D. 1911.

JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

Filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Colorado on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1911, at 5.43 o'clock p. m.

JAMES B. PEARCE, Secretary of State.
By THOMAS F. DILLON, Jr., Deputy.

RIGHT OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES TO ORGANIZE.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article which I hold in my hand, chiefly made up of a letter by Hon. Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, New York City, on the question of the right of the Government employees to unite together in organizing a union. It is a very admirable letter and I think Members might like to read it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

WHEN GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES GO ON STRIKE.

[The Sun, Tuesday, May 18, 1909.]

We have asked and obtained permission to quote from a private letter written by President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, concerning a momentous question which he has made recently the subject of several public addresses:

"The newspapers are advising us day by day of the situation in which the French Government finds itself through an earlier temporizing with this question. France will either be a republic or a commune, with all that the word commune means, unless Clemenceau can have public opinion at his back in the attitude which he is now taking, sound although belated.

"In my judgment the fundamental principle at issue is perfectly clear. Servants of the State in any capacity—military, naval, or civil—are in our Government there by their own choice and not of necessity. Their sole obligation is to the State and its interests. There is no analogy between a servant or employee of the State and the State itself on the one hand, and the laborer and private or corporate capitalist on the other. The tendency of public-service officials to organize for their own mutual benefit and improvement is well enough, so far as it goes. The element of danger enters when these organizations ally or affiliate themselves with labor unions, begin to use labor-union methods, and take the attitude of labor unions toward capital in their own attitude toward the State. In my judgment loyalty and treason ought to mean the same thing in the civil service that they do in the military and naval services. The door to get out is always open if one does not wish to serve the public on these terms. Indeed, I am not sure that as civilization progresses loyalty and treason in the civil service will not become more important and more vital than loyalty and treason in the military and naval services. The happiness and prosperity of a community might be more easily wrecked by the paralysis of its postal and telegraph services, for example, than by a mutiny on shipboard.

"Just as soon as any human being puts the interest of a group or class to which he belongs, or conceives himself to belong, above the interest of the State as a whole, at that moment he makes it impossible for himself to be a good citizen. It seems to me that what I said in my speech in Chicago is entirely true, namely, that a servant of the entire community can not be permitted to affiliate or ally himself with the class interests of a part of the community.

"President Roosevelt's attitude on all this was at times very sound, but he wabbled a good deal in dealing with specific cases. In the celebrated Miller case at the Government Printing Office he laid down in his published letter what I conceive to be the sound doctrine in regard to this matter. It was then made plain to the printers that to leave their work under the pretense of striking was to resign, in effect, the places which they held in the public service, and that if those places were vacated they would be filled in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act, and not by the reappointment of the old employees after parley and compromise.

"It may be that the exact line between a mutual benefit organization and a trade union is not easy to draw; but I think it must be drawn and insisted upon so far as Government employees are concerned, unless we are to permit communism to organize itself under our flag and at the expense of the taxpayers themselves.

"To me the situation which this problem presents is, beyond comparison, the most serious and the most far-reaching which the modern democracies have to face. It will become more insistent and more difficult as Government activities multiply and as the number of civil-service employees increases. Now is the time to settle the question on right principles once for all. So far as my observation goes, the events which have been taking place in France have produced a response from American opinion which is sound to the core."

We have yet to see any clearer exposition of a question which, as Dr. Butler says, "will wreck every democratic government in the world, unless it is faced sturdily and bravely now and settled on righteous lines." We print his remarks in this place because of their uncommon discernment, their vigor, and their justice.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I can state it best by reading from an article appearing in the New York Herald on the 17th of this month, which has just been brought to my attention, in which Mr. John Kirby, jr., president of the American Manufacturers' Association, is reported to have used the following language in an address to that association on a previous date:

"There are danger signs ahead of us," said Mr. Kirby, "in the Sixty-second Congress, and we shall be fortunate indeed if at its final adjournment we are as free from vicious class legislation as we are at present.

"With WILLIAM B. WILSON, one time secretary-treasurer of the miners' union, chairman of the House Labor Committee, his daughter Agnes clerk of the committee, his daughter Mary private secretary to the chairman of the House Labor Committee, and his wife, Mrs. William B. Wilson, janitress of the room of the House Labor Committee, we have a committed American Congress and a fair illustration of the extremes to which labor leaders will go when they get a chance."

Mr. Speaker, the only particle of truth that there is in that statement is that my daughter Agnes is clerk to the Committee on Labor. So far as the statement relative to my daughter Mary is concerned, or to my wife, it is without a particle of foundation in fact. My daughter Agnes has been my secretary for the past 10 years, for more than 10 years—long before I was a Member of Congress. When I became a Member of Congress she was continued as my secretary. When I was elected as chairman of the Committee on Labor, knowing that she had spent 10 years of time in connection with labor organizations, as my secretary, I selected her as clerk to the committee. My daughter Mary and my wife have both been with me during the present session of Congress until recently. They have frequently been in the committee room. My daughter Mary has been sick since she was 12 years of age, and is not physically competent to be a clerk to anyone. My wife has also been sick, having been stricken with paralysis during last February, and is not well yet. She was frequently in the room of the Committee on Labor. That may have given rise to the statement. I do not know. Otherwise it is a malicious statement. My private secretary is Hugh L. Kerwin, of Wellsboro, Pa., and the janitor to the Committee on Labor is Dean Van Kirk, of Galeton, Pa. My wife is the mother of 11 children. We have raised 9 of them. She has been a hard-working woman during her entire lifetime, and she would neither be afraid nor ashamed of being a janitress to a committee, although she prefers being janitress to your humble servant in our home. I look upon this statement as being one that should not go unchallenged. It is a reflection upon me as a Member of this House, and I protest against any statements of this character being sent broadcast over the country. [Applause.]

UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER (after examining the resolution). This is a resolution that will have to go through the basket under the rules of the House. Until a few months ago the unanimous-consent business rested entirely with the Speaker, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Oregon. Just exactly when it was changed I have forgotten, but a new rule was adopted by which there was established a Calendar for Unanimous Consent. At the beginning of the present session, in order to get things in working order, the Chair recognized a few people out of order, but the Chair announced about a week ago that he was going thereafter to observe the rule, and that all such resolutions would have to go through the basket.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House joint resolution 14, relative to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as States into the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the statehood resolution, with Mr. GARRETT in the Chair.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, the question of the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as States of the Union has been so much discussed throughout the public press of the country and by public speakers all over this land and there has been such unanimity of expression in behalf of their right to admission as full States into this Union that it would seem to be useless to take up the time of this House in offering arguments or reasons why these Territories should be admitted as States into the Union. But in listening to the many speeches made on this subject, able and eloquent and varied as they have been, I have concluded that it was but right that as a member of the Committee on the Territories for the past four years I should state to this House some of the reasons that caused me to think that every Member of this House should vote for the admission of these Territories into the Union. Their right to admission has been admitted by all. The great political parties of this Nation have expressed it in their platforms. So far as the Nation could through its public speakers and its party-platform declarations they have promised to these Territories that they should be admitted as States into this Union. The faith of our Nation has been plighted to them for statehood.

For more than a hundred years the Territory of New Mexico has been connected with us, has been studying our institutions, has been learning of us the ways of a republican form of government. They have adopted our customs and principles of government; they have assimilated them; and for more than 60 years they have felt and have been justified in the feeling that they had the absolute promise of this Republic that they should at an early date be admitted as a State. So far as the area is concerned and her population and the character of her citizenship and her vast and varied resources are concerned they justify to the fullest her admission. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I will digress in order to ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, for the purpose of printing a portion of the evidence taken before the Committee on the Territories in the hearings upon the question of the admission of this Territory and Arizona into the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. With this permission I will insert some extracts from the statement of Judge A. B. Fall, a citizen of New Mexico for nearly 30 years and a prominent and distinguished lawyer and member of their constitutional convention:

There is prevalent throughout the country an entirely mistaken idea about New Mexico and the New Mexicans, particularly about those whom we designate as native citizens. There is even a mistaken idea about the name of the Territory. I presume it possible that if you gentlemen thought about it at all you would conclude that New Mexico was named for old Mexico, but the fact is that New Mexico was named 100 years before old Mexico was named.

Old Mexico was the Province of "New Spain" 100 years after New Mexico was known as "New Mexico." New Mexico was governed directly by the King of Spain, and its governors were appointed by the viceroy. The southern boundary of the Province of New Mexico extended to nearly 400 miles south of Juarez, opposite El Paso, Tex.; it included the States of Colorado and California and extended on the north to the Frozen Sea, as shown on the map of the Duke of Burgundy. New Mexico was "discovered" by Coronado in 1541, and was settled by Oñate in 1595. In marching toward New Mexico he discovered the settlement of Santa Barbara, near what is the present mining camp of Parral. He found the country inhabited by Indians who belonged to the same tribe as the Aztecs in Mexico City. They were dressed in cotton cloth. He wrote back that he had discovered a "new Mexico" (referring to Mexico City), and he was appointed or authorized by the viceroy to proceed to explore New Mexico. For 100 years New Mexico was cut off from old Mexico by 400 miles of desert. New Mexico took no part in the Mexican Revolution, because, as I have explained, these people were cut off from old Mexico. They formed a community of their own, and in some respects theirs was the most remarkable communal form of government this country has ever known. The settlements were made along the Rio Grande from the Colorado line to the Texas border. Grants were made by the Spanish Government to the communities, and royal commissioners were sent up there to divide the land into severalties amongst the colonists. The irrigation ditches which were constructed were constructed in common, and have been owned in common for over 300 years. They have an entirely different water system from that which you have in Colorado and other States of the Union; that is, in so far as the Rio Grande section is concerned.

When Gen. Pike went into New Mexico in 1806, and the Santa Fe trail was afterwards opened, the people of New Mexico—and I can give you the names of some of the families—sent their children to school, not in old Mexico, but they sent their children to Missouri to be educated. They sent their children into the United States to be educated. The Lunas, the Chavezes, the Armijos, Oteros, Pereas, Romeros, and others were very prominent families in New Mexico, and sent their children to school in St. Louis. Their girls were educated at Notre Dame and in other places in the United States. After the establishment of the Santa Fe trail New Mexico was in the line of the great freighting operations between Independence, Mo., and old Mexico. There were 300 miles of desert between New Mexico and settlements in old Mexico, and 100 miles in the southern part of New Mexico, known as the Jornado del Muerto (Journey of Death), and these people in New Mexico were the go-betweens between the citizens of the United States and settlements of New Mexico and the people of the northern States of old Mexico.

As I have indicated, these people were familiar with American institutions, and the children of those who were able to bear the expense were educated, as I have stated, in the United States. They knew by far more of American institutions of government then than they know to-day or have ever known of the institutions of old Mexico. Following the opening of the Santa Fe trail and the system of freighting of which I have spoken came the Mexican War, and Gen. Kearny, with Doniphan and his volunteers, crossed the country on his way from Independence, Mo., or Fort Leavenworth, into Mexico.

The condition of these people was very different from anything that ever obtained in old Mexico. These settlers in New Mexico, instead of being peons and slaves subject to some great family, were independent colonists and independent landowners. They constituted an entirely different class of settlers from those in old Mexico. That has been their condition for 300 years and is the same to-day. When they came into the United States, they brought with them not only their laws as to waters and their communal form of government, but they brought the law of acquest property and many other civil laws, forms, and customs. Under the law of acquest community property the wife is the partner of the husband and is entitled to one-half of the entire estate. Now, that does not suit some of our people. Some who have come into the Territory more recently do not understand the old irrigation system, and the consequence is that whenever they see something come up about it in the constitution and the legislature they do not understand it. While that is an old custom here, they do not want anything of the kind. Well, as a matter of fact, it is the only system which would work out properly in the communities where these people live and where they constitute over one-half of the population. With the American settlers, who have acquired property from and live among them, they constitute over one-half of the entire population of the Territory. Now, these people were never connected, except as indicated, with old Mexico.

When the Gadsden purchase was made and the flag was raised under the treaty of Gadsden, the same provision was made guaranteeing the right of Mexicans as citizens of the United States, and again when the organic act establishing the government of New Mexico was enacted by the United States Congress; it was also in the compact with the State of Texas. Texas claimed all that portion of New Mexico lying east of the Rio Grande and up into Colorado. They established a government at Santa Fe; they created it in New Mexico in two or three different counties, but when they undertook to take possession the acting governor of New Mexico, Donaliano Vigil, refused to recognize the authority of the State of Texas and called on the President for protection. Col. Monroe was sent out there, and the President sent a message to Congress calling attention to the very grave difficulties that might arise and saying that some arrangement must be made with Texas. In pursuance of that message of the President of the United States, Texas was paid $10,000,000 for a quitclaim to that portion of New Mexico and Colorado which was involved. In that compact with Texas again the rights of the people who occupied that strip were guaranteed, and at the same time the organic act, which has been our fundamental law down to this time, contained the same provision. It was provided by the Congress of the United States that every one of these Mexicans had the right to vote and hold office.

I have referred to these matters for this purpose: You will see if you undertake to take away from them the right to vote it will create great dissatisfaction, and the right of suffrage must be absolutely guaranteed to them in the constitution or they will prefer to remain where they have been for 60 years, under the Congress. They would prefer to remain under the power of Congress rather than to have these rights taken away from them by any constitutional provision. Therefore it was necessary for us to assure them that they would be protected in these rights, in which you have protected them in the treaties I have referred to, before we could persuade them that it would be better to come into the Union. My friend Gov. Curry has referred to the fact that they sent troops to the Civil War and to the Spanish-American War. The records show that New Mexico furnished more volunteers for the Union cause in the Civil War than was furnished by any other State or Territory west of the Mississippi River in proportion to its population. At the same time the southern part of New Mexico, and where they sympathized with the southern cause, furnished a large proportion to the southern army. In the Spanish-American War the records of the War Department show that New Mexico furnished more than her quota of soldiers called for by the President of the United States. They have been patriotic American citizens; they are American citizens in the best sense of that term. They appreciate our Government, and not one of them would go down into old Mexico if he were offered in exchange for his American citizenship one of the princely cattle ranches of that Republic. I can speak and understand the Spanish language, and have mixed with the people for a great many years, and no more loyal or devoted people ever lived.

Mr. Chairman, I voted in the last Congress for a joint resolution admitting New Mexico into statehood without requiring or suggesting any changes in their constitution as they had framed it and adopted it by an overwhelming majority, and I would do so again. I would do this because the people of this Territory have framed the constitution, and I do not believe it is the part of Congress to tell them how to make their organic law, so long as it is republican in form and not in conflict with the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. In other words, so long as it is not in conflict with a government of the people.

There are provisions in that constitution that I am strongly opposed to, but I do not believe for that reason I should vote to refuse them admission into the Union.

In framing the fabric of this Government it was contemplated and provided that the making of constitutions should be done by the people. Systems were inaugurated for choosing representatives and officers to carry out the will of the people in the three great coordinate branches of the Government, but when it comes to the making of constitutions this has been left to the people alone. Constitutions place limitations upon the different branches of the Government, but let us remember that the people make constitutions.

The organic law of a State, the constitution by which they put limitations and restrictions upon every other branch of their government, is the people's law. They make this the supreme law, and it is not for Congress or Presidents to tell them how they shall make that law. This power is vested in the people, or, rather, I should say is inherent in the people. For these reasons I would not refuse them admittance to this great Union because I disapproved features of a constitution they had made, unless that constitution was clearly subversive of the principles of republican government and repugnant to the principles of the Constitution and Declaration of Independence.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Territories have, by the resolution recommended by its majority, provided for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona. It is true they have submitted to the people of these Territories suggestions that they make some amendments to their constitutions, but, mark you, it is only a suggestion. It is not a requirement that these suggested amendments be made a part of their constitutions. The only requirement is that they go to the ballot box and express there their own preference as to whether they will adopt the suggestions. Their adoption is not a condition precedent to their admission into the Union, but in the exercise of the rights of freemen they will, at the ballot box, say whether they approve the suggestions made and whether or not they will adopt them. For these reasons I can most cheerfully support this resolution for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States in the Union.

The principal amendment offered, or rather suggested, to the people of New Mexico is a substitute for section 19 of their constitution, which is the section providing for the amendment of their constitution. The suggested amendment makes their constitution easier of amendment than is provided in section 19 as they have adopted it. The proposed amendment simply provides an easier method of changing their organic law, and I am sure this can furnish no well-considered reason why this proposition made to them and submitted to their own determination would justify a refusal to support the resolution authorizing their admission to the Union.

Some other amendments are suggested, but, like the above, they are left to their own determination, and I shall not dwell upon them, for, as before stated, I am willing to let them make their own constitution, so long as it is consistent with a free people's government.

I am unable to understand why any man, be he Republican or Democrat, who is actuated by patriotism and by a sense of justice free from the control of partisan bias or design to gain political advantage, can vote to refuse either one of these Territories statehood.

In fact it seems that all the Members of this House, both Republican and Democratic, are willing to admit New Mexico; but when it comes to the admission of Arizona there is a halting on the part of some of our Republican friends. They are not willing to admit Arizona under the constitution framed by the people of that Territory; not willing to even abide by the decision of those people as to whether or not they shall approve the suggested amendment; but they demand that they shall change their constitution, that they shall rewrite their fundamental law in one particular, or else they shall be denied admission to statehood. When we come to consider what this objection is predicated upon it is difficult to understand why representatives of a people's government should stand up and boldly assert that unless the people of Arizona shall strike out from their constitution the provision providing for the recall of members of the judiciary, it shall not be admitted. I am unable to see any justification for this course in reason or in justice.

It has been suggested that the fact that when Arizona is admitted to this Union she will be Democratic; that she will elect two United States Senators who will be Democrats; that she will elect one Member of this House who will be a Democrat; and will have three Democratic electoral votes; and that these reasons operate upon the minds of Republicans and cause them to vote against giving these people their just and natural rights. Mr. Chairman, this is a reflection upon the patriotism and the political integrity of a part of the membership of this House. I know it is difficult for men to rise above partisan influence, and I recognize the further fact that a proper party spirit is not unworthy of the man who believes in the principles of his party; but, sir, when that influence goes to the extent of causing a representative of the people to cast a vote merely for the purpose of strengthening his own party, which violates the rights of a part of the people of this great country, it is unjustifiable, to the uttermost, and surely high-minded men "would scorn the spoil from such foul foray borne."

I appeal to Republicans to rise above such an influence and to do justice to these people. I accuse no man on this floor of being controlled by an improper motive, but I recognize the fact that it is sometimes difficult to let patriotism rise above party advantage.

The recall of judges is the stumbling block, it seems, in the way of Arizona in the minds of some. If a Member of this House honestly believes that that feature of their constitution is not republican in form and subversive of the principles of the Declaration of Independence, he would be justified in casting his vote against its admission; but when we come to analyze and consider the real essence of this provision in their constitution I am unable to understand why it will afford a sufficient reason to justify any man in opposing the admission of the Territory upon this ground.

The discussion in this House has hinged around what was meant by being republican in form. Speakers have undertaken to define what is meant by republican in form. Extracts have been quoted and read from many of our great statesmen; lexicons have been consulted and judicial opinions have been appealed to in the effort to get at a tangible, concrete definition that would furnish a rule or a standard by which this question may be decided.

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the best authority to which we can go in search of light on this question is the fountainhead or the source and beginning of this our own great Government, the greatest and most perfect of all the republics in the history of the world—the wisest and the best republic that has been evolved by the civilization of man. Our fathers undertook to form a republic; they built one, and it occurs to me that there can be no better source of knowledge to go to in search of what is republican than to the builders of this mighty Republic of ours. What is the cardinal principle upon which it rests? In the formation of this Republic the underlying principle was the right of the people to form their government and control it, and the statement in the Declaration of Independence that governments "deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," and the further statement that declares "the right of the people to alter or abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its power in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness," and the statement that this is a "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people," and that other phrase that is contained in so many of the State constitutions which asserts that "all power is inherent in the people"; also mark the statements of two of the wise builders of this governmental fabric:

Mr. James Madison, a member of the Constitutional Convention, said: "* * * If we resort for a criterion to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or may at least bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers, directly or indirectly, from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure for a limited period or during good behavior. It is essential to such government that it be derived from the great body of society and not from any inconsiderable portion or a favored class of it * * *." (The Federalist (Hamilton ed.), paper 39, p. 301.) Another and more pointed definition appears in Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dall., 419, 457; 1 L. ed., 440), by Mr. Justice Wilson, a member of the Constitutional Convention, who but a short time after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in adverting to what is meant by a republican form of government, remarked: "As a citizen, I know the government of that State (Georgia) to be republican, and my short definition of such a government—one constructed on this principle—that the supreme power resides in the body of the people."

One of the framers of the Constitution, Mr. Madison, in No. 43 of the Federalist, in commenting on that clause in the Constitution—section 4, Article IV—which provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government," said:

But the authority extends no further than to a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so and to claim the Federal guaranty for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not change republican for antirepublican constitutions, a restriction which, it is presumed, will hardly be considered as a grievance.

These are the fundamental ideas upon which our Government is based, and these basic principles, it occurred to me, should furnish the best definition of which is republican in form, because they furnish the foundation of this the master Republic of the ages. These are the very foundation stones upon which the fabric of this Republic rests, and can any man in reason say that it is unrepublican for a State to reserve the right to recall an officer or recall a judge when, in the judgment of its people, they believe they should exercise this power, and when they employ the republican methods of doing so by the exercise of the ballot, that legal expression of a freeman's will?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRIS. I had wondered, as the gentleman traveled along very much the same line of thought and belief that I have, if he did not recognize that the people of Arizona—it being a new State, where conditions are rapidly changing, as they are transforming from the Territory to a State—would find the right of recall, initiative, and referendum more necessary there than perhaps in any other place?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it is undoubtedly true that the gentleman is correct. I think it is very reasonable to conclude that the very conditions to which the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma has alluded would give them a better reason for the recall than exists in the old and more settled States.

Mr. FERRIS. And if I may interrupt the gentleman right in the same connection, having so recently gone over precisely the same ground in our State, this position is true: But few of the candidates in a new State are known at all until the time they are elected. The head of the ticket is the only one that any attention is paid to whatever, and the officers lower down on the ticket are voted for just by guess and not by reason of any personal knowledge of their true worth.

Mr. HOUSTON. I repeat that it is most reasonable that their conditions make more justification for the exercise of this power than exists elsewhere. But I want to say this, that they are a part of this great Nation; they should be clothed with all the sovereign rights of the people of every other part of it; they should have the right themselves to pass upon what they need, as they are upon the ground and best know the conditions and what those conditions demand.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that for 50 years, ever since there was an organization of the Territory of Arizona, they have lived under a system of Federal judges, and those men, except possibly in very few instances—none that I know of—have been sent there from other States, have no sympathy with the people, and the people have been ruled by the Federal courts? They are not accustomed to having men whom they have elected themselves, and for that reason they are justified, in my opinion, in not wanting to continue the conditions they have been under for the last 50 years. And I think it is a complete justification of the people of Arizona in having the recall in the constitution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no doubt that their judiciary having been an appointive one, that their judges having been furnished to them from Washington, that the fact that they have not had the right to make the selection of their own members of the judiciary operates very largely to create a strong desire on their part to select their own judges, and not only to select them but to control and regulate the tenure of their office as they see proper to do. You may doubt the wisdom of the recall, but you can not in reason say that it is unrepublican.

So, Mr. Chairman, our Republic, the greatest of all republics and the greatest of all nations, was laid out upon the express principle that all power belongs to the people, and I say to you that no man need be alarmed when they are given, or rather when they choose to exercise this power of recall. I have an abiding faith that in their wisdom they will solve this new departure, in a sense, as they have solved other questions when met and tried. [Applause.]

I do not fear disaster or ruin from the exercise or use of a power inherent in the cardinal principles enunciated by the framers of this Government. The wisdom of their building grows upon the world with the advancing years, and the timbers that they laid beneath the national fabric are sound, secure, and safe.

Do not misunderstand me. I do not favor the recall of judges. I have known no conditions or cause to call for the use of such a power. I believe the people should always have the right and power to elect their judges; to fix their term of office, say, for eight, six, or two years; then if they choose to reserve the right to terminate the tenure of office at an earlier period it is only the exercise of their natural and inherent right to do so. The wisdom of this method may be doubted, but there is no foundation for the claim that they have not the right to adopt it if they choose, or that it is unrepublican.

There is a growing disposition in this country on the part of the people to take more active part in the management of their Government, and this is a healthy and a hopeful sign. The growing sentiment in some parts of the country in favor of the initiative, the referendum, and recall is but a manifestation on the part of the people to take hold of and to control their own governmental agencies. This is by no means an unhealthy symptom.

The fact that the people are on the watch and alive to governmental affairs gives the best guaranty of success to our Nation and is the brightest promise of the full perfection and perpetuation of a people's Government. In their zeal they may make mistakes and call into use untried methods that may prove unwise, but on sober reflection, guided by the experience they will have, they will work out these problems and select the good and discard the bad. This must be true if our Government shall stand, for the judgment of the masses is the final and last voice in controlling the destinies of this country. The more interest they take in its management the better citizens they become and more capable to exercise the rights of freemen and to maintain and perpetuate a people's form of government. So, after all, there is nothing in this feature to alarm us. If any part of the American people see proper to adopt it, they can test it. They can try it upon its merits and pass upon its virtue; and I for one shall not be frightened to leave a question of this kind to the solution of any State that, in its own sovereign capacity, sees proper to make the experiment.

I have confidence in the judiciary of our country. It is a matter of pride to our Nation that almost invariably the judges have been upright and just. The present system among the States has worked well, and to establish the recall would be an innovation that, I believe, would be found upon trial to be impracticable and unwise and one that the people would abandon if it were put in operation; but, Mr. Chairman, that they have the right, in accordance with our republican institutions, to establish this recall I do not think admits of doubt.

For this Congress to exercise the physical power it has to keep Arizona out of the Union because of this feature in its constitution would be an arbitrary exercise of that power that, to my mind, would be utterly unrepublican and even worse than monarchial; it would be despotic. To recognize the right of the people to elect a judge for a given period of time, say, eight, six, or two years, it seems to me, embraces the right to recall that judge or limit his term to a less period if conditions arise that, in their judgment, demand such action.

I think it unwise to go further than to fix his term of office; I think this has proved all sufficient in our country. I think it will stand the test of all conditions that may arise, but I can not say it is unrepublican for a State to exercise the power of recall if in their sovereign capacity they see proper to do so.

In voting to allow Arizona to exercise her own preference as to this feature of her constitution we do not indorse the recall of judges, but we do indorse local self-government and the right of the State to control its own affairs. It is a strained conclusion to reach when you assume that a vote to admit Arizona with the privilege of passing upon this recall feature is an indorsement of the recall. It is an unwarranted conclusion that if carried to its ultimate end would deprive them of the right and power to form their own constitution. What could be more unrepublican than that? Beware lest in the name of republicanism you act the part of the usurper and the tyrant. If you do not allow them to exercise this sovereign right you have utterly trampled under foot the principles of republicanism, of home rule, and local self-government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as said before, I do not favor the recall of judges; I do not believe in it as a policy of State government; but I do not subscribe to the argument that it would take away from the judge the spirit of independent desire to do right. The man or the judge has but a poor opinion of American citizenship who fears to do right less he incur their disapproval. To the honest man who desires to serve and win the approbation of his countrymen there exists every reason and inducement to do right and to discharge his duty faithfully and according to the law as it is written. The character and history of the American people furnish no reason to fear that they will destroy or condemn the faithful and efficient public officer; on the contrary, they honor and sustain a man who does his duty fearlessly and according to his conscience.

I trust these two Territories will not longer be kept out of their just rights.

There is no excuse for longer delay.

They love our institutions and, what is more, they understand them.

In peace and war they have shown their patriotism and valor.

Let the promise of statehood that has been so long on our lips be put into practice.

Let not partisanship longer stand in their way. Let us redeem the plighted faith of this Nation and remove this reproach upon our sacred honor by admitting these Territories as full sisters into our great body of Commonwealths. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McGUIRE]. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have been for a number of years interested in the application of New Mexico and Arizona for admission into the Union. I had the honor of serving as the Delegate to Congress from Oklahoma before that State was admitted, and during that service was for more than four years a member of the Committee on the Territories in this House.

The question of the admission of New Mexico and Arizona was considered at that time, and I became to a greater or less extent familiar with their claims to admission into the Union. There was a difference of opinion in the committee as to the relative merits of these Territories, many Members of the House believing that the two Territories should be united to comprise one State, and the bill which was ultimately recommended by the committee provided that there should be one State formed from these two Territories. Such a provision would give it a vast area, equal in size to the State of Texas. It was believed by many that the physical features as well as the climatic conditions of these Territories would never support a population equal in numbers to that of the average State of the Union unless they were united into one State. On the other hand, many Members believed that they should be separate States, and those differences of opinion resulted in a long and at times an almost bitter struggle in Congress, particularly at the other end of the Capitol, and it was because of those differences that these two Territories failed of admission at that time.

The Constitution of the United States provides—

but leaves the method of admission to the Congress. Few States heretofore admitted have had objectionable provisions in their proposed constitutions, and the most notable, perhaps, of any whose constitutions have contained objectionable provisions was the State of Oklahoma, which I have the honor to represent in part. There were a number of provisions in our constitution which are almost identical with certain of the provisions of the constitution of Arizona, and it was seriously questioned at the time of our admission whether our constitution with respect to the initiative and referendum was republican in form. However, the Congress left that question to be determined by the President of the United States, who approved the constitution in that form and issued his proclamation admitting Oklahoma to the Union.

Personally, I do not believe that the provisions for the initiative and referendum are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The evident purpose of these provisions is: First, that the people may direct legislative bodies by themselves initiating the kind and character of legislation desired; second, that the people may pass judgment upon important legislation, and approve or disapprove at the ballot box legislative acts before they become effective. It has always been my contention that the constitution of Oklahoma does not give the initiative and referendum a fair chance, for the reason that two-thirds of both branches of the State legislature, by voting for a measure, may preclude the possibility of any expression whatever on that measure by the people of my State, and I have the same objection to the provisions in the constitution of Arizona, for the reason that it is almost verbatim with the constitution of Oklahoma, and the meaning is exactly the same.

(3) The second of these reserved powers is the referendum. Under this power the legislature, or 5 per cent of the qualified electors, may order the submission to the people at the polls of any measure, or item, section, or part of any measure, enacted by the legislature, except laws immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, or for the support and maintenance of the departments of the State government and State institutions; but to allow opportunity for referendum petitions, no act passed by the legislature shall be operative for 90 days after the close of the session of the legislature enacting such measure, except such as require earlier operation to preserve the public peace, health, or safety, or to provide appropriations for the support and maintenance of the departments of State and of State institutions: Provided, That no such emergency measure shall be considered passed by the legislature unless it shall state in a separate section why it is necessary that it shall become immediately operative, and shall be approved by the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the legislature, taken by roll call of ayes and nays, and also approved by the governor; and should such measure be vetoed by the governor, it shall not become a law unless it shall be approved by the votes of three-fourths of the members elected to each house of the legislature, taken by roll call of ayes and nays.

The intent of this provision is to refer to the people, if thought necessary either by the legislature or by 5 per cent of the qualified electors, any measure except laws immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, or for the support and maintenance of the departments of the State government and of the State institutions.

But four years of operation under this provision in Oklahoma's constitution has proven conclusively its ineffectiveness with a vicious or incompetent legislature which cares nothing for the spirit of the constitution. The first legislature of Oklahoma had a Democratic majority of more than two-thirds in each house. They were intensely partisan; their principal business was to play politics—the constitution and the people be damned—as is evidenced by the fact that out of 213 legislative acts they evaded this constitutional provision in 149 of them by declaring with a two-thirds majority that the act passed was for the preservation of the public peace, health, and safety.

For example, the following are some of the acts to which the emergency clause was attached, acts which show on their face the incompetency and stupidity of the men who were supposed to represent the people. At the time of the convening of the legislature we had a nonpartisan election law, which was changed by that legislature and supplanted by the most infamous election law this country has ever known; and to accomplish their purpose and to prevent its going to the people for approval or disapproval they attached the emergency clause, and declared that this law was for the public peace, health, and safety, thereby taking advantage of a constitutional provision the supposed purpose of which was to protect the people from just this kind of a legislature, and using it to further their own vicious political purposes, stultifying themselves and degrading our constitution.

I sincerely hope that no legislative body could be found in any other State of the Union which would exhibit such a studied purpose to evade the spirit of the constitution of its State, but as a precaution against such vicious legislative conduct, I trust that Arizona will take advantage of the experience of the people of Oklahoma and amend this paragraph so that there may be no way for her future legislatures to pervert it, avoid it, or misconstrue its meaning.

While I have never been an advocate of the principle of the initiative and referendum, yet I see no great disadvantage in them save and except the probability of the multiplying of elections and the expense incident thereto, as well as the agitation and fomentation which are always the natural product of too frequent campaigns. Without the initiative and referendum, the people at recurring elections select new representatives where the old ones have been unfaithful to a trust or reelect the old ones where they have proven competent and efficient. Mistakes always have been and always will be remedied by the people, and the only advantage of the initiative and referendum is that the people bear the additional expense for an earlier expression of approval or disapproval at the polls of that which the legislature has enacted into law.

If the people of Arizona want the initiative and referendum, they are entitled to it; but they should have the genuine article, so as to give it a fair chance, and not a mere pretense such as we have in Oklahoma.

The trouble with the initiative and referendum provisions of Oklahoma's constitution is that they were written for campaign purposes and not for an effective and basic organic law of a great State. The members of that convention in the preceding campaign had taken advantage of every political fad and fancy. Many of them had promised openly that they would be for and privately that they would not be for this and that provision, as occasion might demand. It was a campaign of promises and empty pledges by persons who had no record from which they could be judged, and under such conditions it was but natural they should straddle all questions where there was a difference of opinion. The Democratic Party had an overwhelming majority in that convention, and they knew as soon as the constitution was completed they must go before the people immediately in another campaign. They wanted the vote of those who were for the initiative and referendum and they must have the vote of those opposed to the initiative and referendum. Hence our constitutional provision, which is meaningless with respect thereto, when a political party is strong enough to kill it by a two-thirds vote.

But I have not mentioned the only instance where they were able to disregard and trample under foot this provision of our constitution. For example, on page 90 of the constitution of Oklahoma, section 35 reads as follows:

SEC. 35. All debts and indebtedness authorized to be incurred by the constitutional convention of the proposed State of Oklahoma, and all expenses of holding the election for the ratification or rejection of this constitution and for the election of officers of a full State government, which shall remain unpaid after the appropriation made by the Congress of the United States has been exhausted are hereby assumed by the State; and it is hereby made the duty of the legislature at its first session to provide for the payment of same: Provided, That the debts and indebtedness the payment of which is hereby assumed by the State shall not include any debt or expense as a salary or compensation of the delegates of the constitutional convention.

The House will observe that all expenses incurred by the constitutional convention not appropriated for by Congress in the enabling act were assumed by the State except the salaries or compensation of delegates to the constitutional convention. You ask why this provision in our constitution. That same question has been asked many times by people who do not understand conditions as they existed at that time in Oklahoma. That constitutional convention had taken six months to write a constitution where the average constitutional conventions of the different States had taken less than 30 days. The people were indignant at the time used and the expenses incurred by the convention, and this indignation was understood by the members to such an extent that when they had under discussion the question of the recall, during the latter days of the convention, the president of the convention stated that if they had the recall at that time there would not be enough of the members left to constitute a quorum; and the facts are that they were forced to insert the frivolous provision in the organic law of a great State that the State would not assume the payment of their salaries, with the hope of reestablishing themselves and of gaining the favor of the people for the coming campaign. And they never failed to mention in their speeches that while the constitutional convention was expensive the members had refused to take their salaries.

But when the legislature met, immediately after the election, that overwhelming Democratic majority not only voted to pay the salaries of the members of the convention, but they declared that it was for the public peace, health, and safety of the people to do it. Suppose in this case they had not made a plaything of our constitution and had not thrown to the winds the rights of the people, and had referred this question of their salaries to the people so short a time after their pledges that they never would take their salaries. The provision would have been overwhelmingly defeated at the polls. But they not only failed to refer it to the people, but by their act in attaching to it this public-peace, health, and safety clause they nullified that provision of the constitution which was supposedly the guaranty to the people of the right of the referendum.

These are only two examples of the 149 measures of similar character which were passed with the attached emergency clause for the peace, health, and safety of the people. Had we not had so recent an example, an object lesson so entirely conclusive as to its effect, we would think such procedure in a civilized community beyond the limit of legislative perfidy. It has been suggested that the people of Arizona would not take such advantage of their own constitution. That may be true, but inasmuch as it has been done in another State it is not at all improbable that at some time in the future the same vicious practices may be repeated in Arizona; and it is for that reason that I am now calling the attention of Congress and the country as well as of the people of Arizona to the villainy which may be consummated under this provision of their proposed constitution.

Now, as to the provision for the recall in this proposed constitution. I never have been and am not now in favor of that provision. While I do not believe anything serious would come of it, except as to the judiciary, yet I am not of the opinion that any good can follow. The average tenure of office in the United States, both in Federal and State offices, is very short as compared with other countries. For instance, a Member of Congress must meet the judgment of the people every two years, leaving scarcely time to call and hold an election before his term of office has expired.

The same is true of the State legislatures of the various States, they seldom having a provision for more than two years of service. That, in my judgment, is only a sufficient length of time to give any officer a fair chance to be understood by his constituents. If he makes a mistake, his own party, as a rule, repudiates him, for the reason that the strongest and best men of the country must be presented for the judgment of a reading and intelligent people. And in a country where we have a government by political parties, as is always the case in every representative government, every public officer must stand the test of accusations from the opposing political party, of being continuously watched, of having his every official act scrutinized, a condition which leaves a very narrow margin for the public official, and one which, I believe, renders absolutely unnecessary this provision of the recall.

That which I have said regarding public officials in general, and a great deal more, may be said of the judiciary of the States of the Union. Their tenure is short; their business is to settle the differences of contending litigants, and no difference how able nor how just the judge, the defeated litigant will complain. It is always an easy matter to get 20 per cent of the opposition party to petition for the removal of any officer, judges included. And when you inaugurate the recall under the provisions of this constitution, the weaker of the judiciary may dodge the questions so necessary to be settled honestly, squarely, and fairly upon the law and the evidence without fear or favor. And not only that; the real lawyer, the conscientious jurist, the man of splendid and superior qualities—in other words, the very kind of man whom we should seek for the bench—would not hazard his reputation for discretion, fairness, and integrity by submitting himself to the dissatisfaction of contending litigants, the machinations of opposing political parties, and the passing whim of malcontents.

What we should have is the best judicial material of the country. Without the recall we may have it; with the recall it is impossible to get it. There may be isolated cases of unfaithful judges, but the rule is entirely the other way. Our confidence in the American judiciary has thus far seldom been misplaced. Under the present practice we obtain the highest standard of American citizenship for the bench. Under this proposed constitution, I am convinced, that standard will be lowered rather than elevated. It may do but little harm to test it, but I have looked in vain for its justification.

It is my hope that New Mexico and Arizona may be admitted to the Union, and I hope to see them admitted on an equal footing with the other States. I have confidence enough to believe that their people will ultimately work out their own salvation, but I should like to see them come without this expression of distrust embodied in the fundamental law of their States.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON]. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend when this discussion began, and as it proceeded, to take part in it. In fact, I was willing then, as I am willing now, to vote for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona into the Union with or without the amendments that are suggested in the report of the committee. My reason for occupying the time of the committee and for soliciting a portion of the time from the chairman is that there has been disclosed in the debate, and there is disclosed in one of the constitutions submitted, a tendency, if not an announced principle, which primarily as an American, but, secondarily, as a Democrat, I protest against.

I have fully realized in my short service here that however active I may have been at the bar, it leaves me new, young, and unsteady on my feet in the great parliamentary business of this country, and I would willingly have foregone the opportunity and the honor of submitting my views at this time under the apprehension which grew out of that unsteadiness, if I did not feel constrained by what I believe to be a sense of public duty, to call the attention of the committee to the objections which I entertain against these tendencies and the principle announced in the Arizona constitution.

I share with the most democratic of Democrats the conviction that all power resides finally in the bosom of the whole people, and I share with them their enthusiastic support of the proposition that this power may be exercised by the people to alter or to abolish the government under which they live. But I think it would be prudent and wise if we should for a moment reexamine the structure of our own Government, and particularly that instrument for public control which was fashioned by the hands of our forebears, which for more than a hundred years has sustained a great civilization and which has enabled us to take our place among the nations of the earth.

The structure of this Government, as I understand it, and the structure which has been more or less imitated by our State governments which have lately come into the Union and those State governments which are comprised in the original Thirteen States, was, as I have become fully convinced, distinctly, intentionally, and wholly representative in form.

Much has been said here in this discussion as to what is meant by "republican form of government." The clause in the Constitution under which this discussion has been had is rather unusual in its phraseology. It says:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature or of the executive against domestic violence.

I should have been pleased, Mr. Chairman, could I persuade myself that the language employed in that section of the Constitution, referring to a republican form of government, really meant a guaranty of representative government. In the first investigation which I attempted to make I did, indeed, persuade myself that what was intended was that there should be a guaranty of a representative form of government, and that any government which did not rise to the standard of a representative form of government would not meet the requirements of this section of the Constitution. I must, however, in the utmost candor, admit that I have not been able to vindicate wholly the position in which I first found myself, and I am not now able to say that I believe that the words "republican in form," as here used, carry with them a guaranty of a distinctly representative form of government. If I did so, I would not vote for the admission of Arizona into the Union; and, I am free to confess, I would not know how to treat those States in the Union which have adopted the initiative, referendum, and recall, which I sincerely believe to be opposed to a representative form of government.

But on an examination of the authorities with which, and for the submission of which, I crave the indulgence of the committee, I find the best authority upon the question does not use the words "republican" and "representative" in anything like a synonymous sense. Mr. Cooley says:

> The principles of republican government are not a set of inflexible rules, vital and active in the Constitution, though unexpressed, but they are subject to variation and modification from motives of policy and public necessity; and it is only in those particulars in which experience has demonstrated any departure from the settled practice to work injustice or confusion that we shall discover an incorporation of them in the Constitution in such form as to make them definite rules of action under all circumstances.

May I draw the attention of the committee to a brief examination of our exact position in the effort to distinguish between a representative and a republican form of government, and in that connection may I ask you to consider the further declaration of Mr. Cooley in his work on constitutional limitations? He says:

> In every sovereign State there resides an absolute and uncontrolled power of legislation. In Great Britain this complete power rests in the Parliament; in the American States it resides in the people themselves as an organized body politic. But the people, by creating the Constitution of the United States, have delegated this power as to certain subjects and under certain restrictions to the Congress of the Union; and that portion they can not resume, except as may be done through amendment of the National Constitution. For the exercise of legislative power, subject to this limitation, they create, by their State constitution, a legislative department upon which they confer it; and, granting it in general terms, they must be understood to grant the whole legislative power which they possessed, except so far as at the same time they saw fit to impose restrictions.

> While, therefore, the Parliament of Great Britain possesses completely the absolute and uncontrolled power of legislation, the legislative bodies of the American States possess the same power except, first, as it may have been limited by the Constitution of the United States, and, second, as it may have been limited by the constitution of the State. A legislative act can not therefore be declared void, unless its conflict with one of these two instruments can be pointed out.

Now, the proposition in the Arizona constitution is to reserve to the people of Arizona the right to initiate legislation upon a certain percentage, and also to reserve to them the right to compel the submission to them of legislation which has been wholly or partially enacted.

I am well aware of the earnestness of the advocates of the initiative, referendum, and recall. I have heard upon this floor the assertion that to oppose them is practically to distrust the people. Let me call the attenion of my friends to the fact that by this proposed program they are confounding and confusing the power of the people to erect a great organic structure of a State with the power of ordinary legislation conferred upon the legislative branch of that State. They seem to have lost sight of the fact that when there is a constitution, as there no doubt will be in Arizona, and the people, in addition to that, initiate legislation, as they no doubt will, as that legislation is adopted by the people, the difference between the organic law as it is written in the constitution and the initiative legislation which they propose to adopt will be one of form rather than of substance, for the organic law and the legislation thus adopted will be no different in source or no different in the method of adoption, and therefore primarily will be the law arising from the supreme expressed will of the people; and every act of the people, either by initiative legislation or by legislation which has gone through the process of the referendum, will derive its force and its power from exactly the same source as does the constitution.

Let me submit, Mr. Chairman, for a moment to the consideration of the committee what I regard as the best definition available to me of a constitution:

> What is a constitution? It is a form of government delineated by the mighty hand of the people in works in which the first principles of fundamental law are established. The constitution is certain and fixed. It contains the permanent will of the people and is the supreme law of the land. It is paramount to the power of the legislature, and can be revoked and altered only by the power that made it.

That is from a decision in Second Dallas of our Supreme Court Reports. And may I submit another definition? The supreme court of Arkansas said:

What is a constitution? The constitution of an American State is the supreme, organized, and written will of the people acting in convention, assigning to the different departments of the government their respective powers. It may limit and control the action of those departments, or it may confer upon them any extent of power not incompatible with the Federal compact. By an inspection and examination of all the constitutions of our country they will be found to be nothing more than so many restrictions or limitations upon the departments of the government and the people.

Taking the initiative separately and apart from the referendum in the Arizona constitution, what is it designed to accomplish? Our friends say, "We desire to place in the hands of the people the power to initiate legislation which a legislature may have failed to initiate." They say that those of us who are opposed to their program have shown a distrust of the people. Let me call their attention to the fact that it is not a matter of right or power. It is really a matter of sound wisdom in the conduct of a great government. Those who went before us, and laid deep those foundations to which we so often recur and with which we so often consult, knew that it was necessary and wise to guard against the power of the majority just as it had been necessary and wise to guard against the power of a tyrant in a monarchy. [Applause.]

Those men understood—they had drunk deep drafts of information from the great wells of the lawgivers of the earth—that they must so construct the organic law of this land that there should be embedded within it great and sacred rights against which neither the protests of the minority nor the passions of the majority should prevail, and that the final determination of the rights of both should find its lodgment in the great judicial system of this country.

You say—those of you who are in favor of this program—that you wish to put it in the power of the people to initiate legislation in your State. Where, in the final and full philosophy of your doctrine, will your Supreme Court be? What will be its status? You may write into the Arizona constitution that any law that conflicts with that constitution shall be unconstitutional and the courts may so declare it; but if you give to the people of that State the power, through the legislature, or in conjunction with the legislature, to make any day in the year by the initiative any law, or to have referred to them any law proposed by the legislature, you are in fact providing for legislation, in the ordinary sense, whose source, whose power, and whose binding effect shall be as great and as final as the organic law expressed in your constitution.

What will be the attitude of the courts of the State if they are called upon to review a legislative act which has been brought about by the initiative through the medium of the people? How will they approach the question of declaring that kind of a law to be in conflict with the constitution of the State, especially when they know that it and they spring from the same source?

I say, my friends, you may protest that it is a distrust of the people, but it is really yourselves who are destroying trust in the people—that supreme and definite trust which was created in the inception and which has been maintained in the development of this Government. You say to me that I do not trust the people, but I tell you that I trust them more than you do, for I trust them to choose their representatives and to compel their representatives to respond to their will, to do their final bidding, to represent them, and to achieve for them in a representative capacity what the people themselves in their multifarious occupations can not achieve. You who favor these particular laws do not trust the people because you are not willing that they should choose their representatives, and you have not faith in them that they can compel their representatives to respond to their will.

The referendum in all its essentials does not differ from the initiative. Our friends have said to us, and we have seen it published, but without foundation, that there has been a breakdown in representative government. Mr. Chairman, I challenge any man to find any era in American history in which the legislative and executive branches of the Government have been so keenly sensible of the popular will as they are to-day. There may be occasions, there may be places, in which there has been a breakdown, but as a general proposition it is not true. The whole world to-day is governed by some system of representation—in science, in art, in commerce, in banking, in law, in scholarship—wherever the human race has made any progress or advancement. If you will analyze the sources of that development you will find that it has resulted and depends upon the judgment of those who have the selection of the man, and the final fulfillment of that judgment by that man in his representative capacity.

Let me draw your attention to the early opinions of the great statesmen of this country on the question of representative government. Mr. Webster said, in the case of Luther v. Borden, in the Seventh of Howard:

Let me state what I understand these principles to be. The first is, that the people are the source of all political power. Everyone believes this. Where else is there any power? There is no hereditary legislature; no large property; no throne; no primogeniture. Everybody may buy and sell. There is an equality of rights. Anyone who should look to any other source of power than the people would be as much out of his mind as Don Quixote, who imagined that he saw things which did not exist. Let us all admit that the people are sovereign. Jay said that in this country there were many sovereigns and no subject. A portion of this sovereign power has been delegated to government, which represents and speaks the will of the people as far as they chose to delegate their power. Congress have not all. The State governments have not all. The Constitution of the United States does not speak of the government. It says the United States. Nor does it speak of State governments. It says the States, but it recognizes governments as existing. The people must have representatives. In England the representative system originated not as a matter of right, but because it was called by the king. The people complained sometimes that they had to send up burgesses. At last there grew up a constitutional representation of the people. In our system it grew up differently. It was because the people could not act in mass, and the right to choose a representative is every man's portion of sovereign power. Suffrage is a delegation of political power to some individual. Hence the right must be guarded and protected against force or fraud. That is one principle. Another is that the qualification which entitles a man to vote must be prescribed by previous laws directing how it is to be exercised, and also that the results shall be certified to some central power so that the vote may tell. We know no other principle. If you go beyond these, you go wide of the American track. One principle is that the people often limit their government; another, that they often limit themselves.

Let us turn from New England to the South and consult a southern writer upon this subject. Our minds naturally turn to that distinguished and venerable Virginian, who so long adorned this Chamber and at whose feet so many men in America gathered instruction and learning, John Randolph Tucker, of Virginia. He said:

Representation is the modern method by which the will of a great multitude may express itself through an elected body of men for deliberation in lawmaking. It is the only practicable way by which a large country can give expression to its will in deliberate legislation. Give the suffrage to the people, let lawmaking be in the hands of their representatives, and make the representatives responsible at short periods to the popular judgment, and the rights of men will be safe, for they will select only such as will protect their rights and dismiss those who, upon trial, will not. True representation is a security against wrong and abuse in lawmaking.

If we leave these great and wise philosophers to one side and consult the Supreme Court of the United States, we will find, in the case of In re Duncan (139 U. S.), that court adopting the language of Mr. Webster, just quoted, and proceeding further to say:

By the Constitution a republican form of government is guaranteed to every State in the Union, and the distinguishing feature of that form is the right of the people to choose their own officers for governmental administration and pass their own laws in virtue of the legislative power reposed in representative bodies, whose legitimate acts may be said to be those of the people themselves. But while the people are thus the source of political power their governments, National and State, have been limited by written constitutions, and they have themselves thereby set bounds to their own power as against the sudden impulses of mere majorities.

Then the Chief Justice takes up Mr. Webster's argument in the case of Luther v. Borden, and he says:

Mr. Webster's argument in that case took a wider sweep and contained a masterly statement of the American system of government as recognizing that the people are the source of all political power, but that as the exercise of governmental powers immediately by the people themselves is impracticable they must be exercised by representatives of the people; that the basis of representation is suffrage; that the right of suffrage must be protected and its exercise prescribed by previous law and the results ascertained by some certain rule; that through its regulated exercise each man's power tells in the constitution of the government and in the enactment of laws; that the people limit themselves in regard to the qualifications of electors and the qualifications of the elected, and to certain forms for the conduct of elections; that our liberty is the liberty secured by the regular action of popular power, taking place and ascertained in accordance with legal and authentic modes; and that the Constitution and laws do not proceed on the ground of revolution or any right of revolution, but on the idea of results achieved by orderly action under the authority of existing governments, proceedings outside of which are not contemplated by our institutions.

I could multiply the authorities on this subject, Mr. Chairman, but, as my time is limited, I shall call the attention of the committee to but a few more. It has been held in this country by a court of respectable standing that laws enacted by the people in the method proposed in the Arizona constitution are in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. For example, in the case of Rice v. Foster, in the State of Delaware, it has been held:

Although the people have the power, in conformity with its provisions, to alter the Constitution, under no circumstances can they, so long as the Constitution of the United States remains the paramount law of the land, establish a democracy or any other than a republican form of government.

And this, the court went on to declare, would in effect be done should the electorate be given a direct legislative power.

In the State of New York, in the case of Barto v. Himrod, the court said:

It is not denied that a valid statute may be passed to take effect upon the happening of some future event, certain or uncertain. But such a statute, when it comes from the hand of the legislature, must be a law in præsenti to take effect in futuro. * * * The event or change of circumstances on which a law may be made to take effect must be such as in the judgment of the legislature affects the question of the expediency of the law; an event on which the expediency of the law, in the judgment of the lawmakers, depends. On this question of expediency the legislature must exercise its own judgment definitely and finally. * * * But in the present case no such event or change of circumstances affecting the expediency of the law was expected to happen. The wisdom or expediency of the free-school law, abstractly considered, did not depend on a vote of the people. If it was unwise or inexpedient before that vote was taken, it was equally so afterwards. The event on which the act was made to take effect was nothing else than the vote of the people on the identical question which the Constitution makes it the duty of the legislature itself to decide. * * * The government of the State is democratic, and it is a representative democracy, and in passing general laws the people act only through their representatives in the legislature.

In addition to this, let me call your attention to so eminent an authority as Mr. Madison, in so far as what he says may apply to the proposed program in the Arizona constitution; for the question here really is, Shall we descend from the established position of a representative government to try the uncertain experiment of pure democracy upon a great continent? Mr. Madison said:

From this view of the subject it may be concluded that a pure democracy, by which I mean a society consisting of a small number of citizens who assemble and administer the government in person, can admit of no cure for the mischiefs of faction. A common passion or interest will in almost every case be felt by a majority of the whole; a communication and concert result from the form of government itself, and there is nothing to check the inducements to sacrifice the weaker party or an obnoxious individual. Hence it is that such democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security or the rights of property, and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths.

A republic, by which I mean a government in which the scheme of representation takes place, opens a different prospect and promises the cure for which we are seeking. Let us examine the points in which it differs from the pure democracy and we shall comprehend both the nature of the cure and the efficacy which it must derive from the union.

The two great points of difference between the democracy and a republic are: First, the delegation of the government in the latter to a small number of citizens elected by the rest.

* * * The effect of the first difference is, on the one hand, to refine and enlarge the public views by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country, and whose patriotism and love of justice will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations. Under such a regulation, it may well happen that the public voice, pronounced by the representatives of the people, will be more consonant to the public good than if pronounced by the people themselves convened for the purpose.

Now, permit me to read a quotation from Mr. Jefferson upon this subject, in a letter which he wrote to M. Coray:

Modern times have discovered the only device by which the equal rights of man can be secured, to wit, government by the people acting not in person but by representatives chosen by themselves—that is to say, by every man of ripe years and sane mind who either contributes by his purse or person to the support of his country.

I could go further and assemble such authorities and with him others of the great men who illumined the literature of the world with the Federalist. I could quote Watson and Cooley and Story. I will for a moment go back to John Stuart Mill and call attention to the very fountain source of the one great work distinctly devoted to representative government. Mr. Mill says:

From these accumulated considerations it is evident that the only government which can fully satisfy all the exigencies of the social state is one in which the whole people participate; that any participation, even in the smallest public function, is useful; that the participation should everywhere be as great as the general degree of the improvement of the community will allow; and that nothing less can be ultimately desirable than the admission of all to a share in the sovereign power of the State. But since all can not, in a community exceeding a single small town, participate personally in any but some very minor portions of the public business it follows that the ideal type of a perfect government must be representative.

Let us consider for a moment later authorities upon the subject, and among them we must not overlook the distinguished governor of New Jersey, who occupied so conspicuous a place as president of Princeton University and who has written so ably and well upon this subject. He says, among other things:

It is for this reason as much as for any other that the balance of power between the States and the Federal Government now trembles at an unstable equilibrium, and we hesitate into which scale to throw the weight of our purpose and preference with regard to the legislation by which we shall attempt to thread the maze of our present economic needs and perplexities. It may turn out that what our State governments need is not to be sapped of their powers and subordinated to Congress, but to be reorganized along simpler lines which will make them real organs of popular opinion. A government must have organs; it can not act inorganically, by masses. It must have a lawmaking body; it can no more make law through its voters than it can make law through its newspapers.

[Applause.]

Mr. Wilson in another book reviewed deliberately the situation of Switzerland, and said:

So far has the apparent logic of democracy been carried in Switzerland that the people exercise in several ways a direct part in lawmaking. The right of petition, which is recognized in every country where popular rights exist at all, has become in Switzerland a right of initiative legislation.

Then he discusses the application of the policy there. He says:

The initiative has been very little used, having given place in practice, for the most part, to the referendum. Where it has been employed it has not promised either progress or enlightenment, leading rather to doubtful experiments and to reactionary displays of prejudice than to really useful legislation. In both of the great Cantons of Zurich and Berne, the most populous and influential in the confederation, it has been used to abolish compulsory vaccination. It was established for the confederation only six years ago (1891), and has been used in federal legislation only to aim a blow at the Jews, under the disguise of a law forbidding the slaughtering of animals by bleeding.

In reference to the referendum Mr. Wilson says:

It is still tested only in part. It has led in most cases to the rejection of radical legislation, even to the rejection of radical labor legislation, such as the ordinary voter might be expected to accept with avidity. The Swiss populations, being both homogeneous and deeply conservative, have resisted, as perhaps no other people have, the infection of modern radical opinion. They have shown themselves apt to reject, also, complicated measures which they do not fully comprehend, and measures involving expense which seems to them unnecessary. And yet they have shown themselves not a little indifferent, too. The vote upon most measures submitted to the ballot is usually very light; there is not much popular discussion; and the referendum by no means creates that quick interest in affairs which its originators had hoped to see it excite. It has dulled the sense of responsibility among legislatures without in fact quickening the people to the exercise of any real control in affairs.

[Applause.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman to yield for the purpose of permitting the reading of a short paragraph containing a statement by Gov. Woodrow Wilson in Oregon on the 17th day of the present month, on the subject upon which the gentleman has been addressing the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. LITTLETON. I will say to the gentleman from Oregon that it will give me much pleasure to give him part of my time or part of anything else that I may possess or enjoy, but I have been allotted only one hour of time, and the necessities of the moment prevent me from yielding.

Mr. MANN. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we on this side could give additional time to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I suggested, Mr. Chairman, that additional time could be yielded to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAFFERTY. This is a statement made by Gov. Woodrow Wilson while within the confines of the great State of Oregon. I commend most of his statements. This is taken from the Oregonian, of Portland, Oreg., of May 18, 1911. It says:

The laws of recent years adopted in this State seem to me to point the direction which the Nation must also take before we have completed our regeneration of a Government which has suffered so seriously and so long from private management and selfish organization. Primary laws should be extended to every elective office and to the selection of every committee or official in order that the people may once for all take charge of their own affairs.

To nullify bad legislation the referendum must be adopted, and it is only a question of time until it will be extended to the Nation. The better education of the people through the various States, of which Oregon was the first, will enable them to pass intelligently upon national measures. In such manner will popular government be lifted from the ranks of theory to actuality and a democracy which represents the will of the people be established.

I have not yet made up my mind on the subject of the recall of the judiciary. I am open to conviction, but I as yet fail to see where it would be a wise law in many respects, as fear of the people's displeasure might lead some judges to cater more to popular expression than to an interpretation of the law. It is a great problem and must be approached cautiously.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LANGHAM] yields to the gentleman from New York an amount of time equivalent to the amount consumed by the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. LANGHAM. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is three minutes.

Mr. LITTLETON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all that was read by the gentleman from Oregon, but I think I know what he read from the little I did hear. I have submitted the authority of the scholar, the student, the thinker, and the philosopher upon civil government. I prefer to accept that as a riper and a wiser opinion than any fugitive utterance made in the friction of politics—even though it was made in the great State of Oregon. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTLETON. I can not yield any of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LITTLETON. I will yield if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LANGHAM], on the other side, will pay it back to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. For one question—a question of one sentence?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, my time has about expired and I shall omit references to other branches of the initiative and referendum which I had intended to discuss. Let me say, however, that as popular suffrage is not a matter of right, but a matter of privilege to be conferred by the States, and as it may be limited or unlimited, according as the judgment of the State may dictate, and as it is claimed in this debate that the whole power of government resides in the people, the foundation of the initiative and referendum is logically unsound. If the initiative and referendum had been a part of the scheme of government of the Original Thirteen States, with their qualified suffrage, it would have been far from being a truly democratic Government.

I wish to close my remarks with a reference to what I regard as the third and last of the three great errors proposed, and that is the recall of officers.

I may say what I am sure even my most bitter opponents will not dispute: That you can not procure the services of a man in an important and remunerative situation in any civilized country of the world without entering into some general agreement with him as to the period of his service and the tenure of his employment. If the position is one that calls for great discretion and judgment, one which requires an exercise of authority and power, even though it be in a private employment, you will not find men accepting it with power on the part of the employer to recall him at the end of six months' service.

On the other hand, in the service of the Government, you will find that the civil service has striven for years and years against great difficulty not only to destroy the power of recall but to make it impossible to remove from the public service even subordinate employees who have proven themselves faithful and who are protected within the confines of the civil-service law.

I may say in a phrase that I believe the initiative, referendum, and recall to be the great trinity of modern errors and that they propose the prostration and destruction of representative government as it has been established in this country, as it has been maintained for over 100 years, and as it is being maintained to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not say this in any sense from a distrust of the people. It is because I believe in the wisdom of the founders of our Government. I believe that a community may be able to choose a man to represent them and at the same time the same community be wholly incompetent to pass upon a statute, to enact a law, or to discriminate in legislation in such a way as to serve themselves or their country. Our fathers selected and founded the finest instrument for government that could have been fashioned in the light of the experience of all the ages, and that was a representative form of government. It is proposed in this constitution, in addition to the initiative and referendum, to allow 25 per cent of the voters at the last election to recall public officers of all classes within six months after their election. I can not understand how any gentleman can consider the initiative, referendum, and recall together. If you are going to strip the legislature of its power and provide that the people may initiate legislation, and, in addition to that, have legislation referred, then your legislators become simply a set of draftsmen whom you send there, and therefore there will be no occasion to recall them, because they will have nothing to do to be recalled for. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I can understand how you might impeach a legislator or other public officer for the betrayal of his trust, but I can not understand by what process of logic the initiative and the referendum and recall is to be applied distinctly to the legislative body. It is a departure from the traditions of our country, and, in my opinion, a debauchery of the law of impeachment. We have always understood that public officials, as well as private individuals, when charged with any offense must be accused in writing, must be confronted with the witnesses against them, must be allowed to answer, must be given an opportunity to be heard, and must be tried according to the due process of law. This is not so under the recall. It is in fact taking the seasoned and staid traditions of impeachment and translating them into a trial by tumult. The orderly processes of regulated justice are to be converted into a sporadic assault born of hate and disappointment. The dignified minister of the established law, ennobled by the grandeur of his lofty station and disciplined by the pressure of a sober responsibility, is to be degraded by the impending threat and distracted by the uncertainty of a precarious tenure.

The misguided or malignant passions of an unimportant fragment of the community may recklessly accuse the most stainless judge and by a groundless charge put suspicion in the place of confidence and distrust in the place of faith.

The lying litigant, baffled in his mendacious effort to subsidize the court to make secure his fabricated cause, lays his unscrupulous hand upon this ruthless weapon to strike from public esteem the upright judge.

The culpable confederates of the convicted criminal, audacious in that freedom which has foiled detection and angered at the thought that tardy justice has overtaken one of their members, can assemble and foment the necessary and irresponsible fraction to put on trial the conservator of public honor. The corporate bandit, marauding through the legitimate fields of honest commerce and finally condemned by the firm hand of an incorruptible court, can turn its passive chagrin into active revenge and summon sufficient of its dependents to write a recall.

The agrarian agitator, whose uplifted hand is always against the substance and the symbols of order, unable to write his crooked creed into the court's decrees, will call for venal volunteers to rebuke the judge who dared deny his loud protestations.

The reformer, whose righteous zeal and unbalanced judgment make him at once the most attractive and most dangerous of men, will find the courts archaic and too rigid bound to serve the elastic purpose of his pretentious program, and his honest wrath will stir the souls of his faithful followers to issue a recall in the name of all political virtue.

The "boss," who in the flush of full success sits in the shadow of the throne, and who even in defeat still reigns a mighty ruler in the empire of intrigue, will touch the mysterious sources of his unjust powers with deft and secret sign, and swarms of satraps will rise in mockery of the voice of an outraged community to indict the fearless judge.

The daring demagogue, whose eager ear catches the first sound of discontent and whose strident voice swells it into a volume of protest against oppression, whose whole platform is the appropriated grievances of the community, will make of the recall a recurring opportunity to put himself in flexible adjustment with the superficial sentiment of the community.

And upon what grounds, Mr. Chairman, is it proposed to recall the judges?

Does the Arizona constitution provide that they may be recalled for malfeasance or misfeasance?

Does it set any limitation upon this sudden impulse of dissatisfaction?

Does it attempt to protect the judiciary against the caprice of a meddlesome fraction of the community?

Does it seriously set down in writing the impeachable offenses?

You will look in vain for any limitation upon this reckless power.

The recall is a political indictment found without evidence, charging no offense, moral or legal, presented to the entire community as a court. The defendant is stripped of all presumptions. He can not answer the charge, because no charge is necessary to convict him.

The answer is made that the recall simply affords the judge an opportunity to go before the people at another election.

Yes; but how does he go? Does he go as a clean-hearted, clear-headed candidate, resting his claims upon his ability as a judge or his honor as a man? Does he go with pride gathered as the fruits of a useful life? Does he go as the embodiment of courage and patriotism? No; he goes with character dismantled by the attacks of those who would destroy him. He goes with his oath of office broken by the furtive whisperings of those who hold a grudge. He goes with his honor stained by the vulgar hands of the reckless accuser. He goes leaving his family at home in the shadow of disgrace. He goes impugned, impeached, outraged, and dishonored, not so much to regain the worthless office, but to restore his shattered fame and recover his foreclosed honor. [Applause.]

How will it finally affect the character of our judiciary? What ultimate contribution will it make to the stability of good government?

As I see it, the man of dignity and honor will not submit himself to the possibilities of degradation by the recall. No one but the spineless seeker for office would place himself in the hands of an irresponsible fraction of the community. The idle invertebrate gambling on his versatile capacity to adjust himself to every whim of discontent and the caprice of every faction may lend his protean genius to this scheme of judge baiting.

The irresolute timeserver may speculate upon his negative ability to do and say nothing from which the community could draw any conclusion on any subject. [Applause.]

But the lofty character, the stout heart, and the ripe experience of the man fitted to determine the great issues of life, liberty, and property, will decline the probationary tenure.

How will it affect the rights of person and of property? How will it secure the impartial preservation of life, liberty, and property?

Suppose the recalled judge is sitting in judgment upon the life of a fellow citizen. Suppose the passions of the community are at white heat. Is not the judge on trial as well as the prisoner? Instead of holding the scales of justice with even hand and applying the law with fearless disregard of the results, is he not scanning the ugly faces of an angry mob and wondering who will be his accuser in the recall? Does he not search the inscrutable faces of the warring factions for the fatal percentage which will arraign him before the country on the recall?

Suppose the recallable judge is sitting to determine a controversy between employer and employed. Suppose on one side is organized labor and on the other organized capital. Does he meet the grave, economic, and legal questions as the great and dauntless minister of justice? Does he summon to his aid the juridical learning of the ages and invoke the spirit of passionless justice to guide him? Or does he see in the grim and earnest faces of the contestants the imminence of a recall which will put him to shame before his neighbors? [Applause.]

It will strike from the splendid structure of free government the arch upon which it has come to rest with unshaken confidence. It will cleave the very heart of a great representative democracy and enervate its vital forces. We look in vain for precedents, for no people ever dared to write such an example into their history. We make fruitless search for comparisons, but the intelligent nations of the earth have only contrasts to offer.

The examples of patriotism and courage in the history of English-speaking people are those of the unterrified judge holding together the almost dismembered governments.

We turn with unaffected pride to our own John Marshall, without whose genius and courage the history of our country might have been the chronicles of contending States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, wherever we turn in the history of all peoples and nations we read a protest against the degradation of our judiciary. There is no case or occasion in history, sacred or profane, which so graphically reveals the supine judge as does the almost piteous protestations of Pilate against the brutal cry of the mobs:

And the whole multitude of them arose, and led him unto Pilate.
And they began to accuse him, saying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a King.
And Pilate asked him, saying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And he answered him and said, Thou sayest it.
Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, I find no fault in this man.
And they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place.
When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were a Galilean.
And as soon as he knew that he belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time.
And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad: for he was desirous to see him of a long season, because he had heard many things of him; and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him.
Then he questioned with him in many words; but he answered him nothing.
And the chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused him.
And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate.
And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together: for before they were at enmity between themselves.
And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people,
Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him:
No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him.
I will therefore chastise him, and release him.
(For of necessity he must release one unto them at the feast.)
And they cried out all at once, saying, Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas:
(Who for a certain sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison.)
Pilate therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again to them.
But they cried, saying, Crucify him, crucify him.
And he said unto them the third time, Why, what evil hath he done? I have found no cause of death in him: I will therefore chastise him, and let him go.
And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed.
And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required.
And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

God forbid that the sanctuaries of justice in this country of America shall ever be ravished by the sibilant hiss of a mob crying, Crucify him! Crucify him! [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, before the general debate on this question closes, I want to say just a few words. Seven days have been consumed in general debate on this resolution proposing the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States of the Union, and notwithstanding the weather has been extremely hot and uncomfortable the sessions have been long, the speechmaking practically unlimited as to the time, the arguments thoughtful and logical, and the eloquence unsurpassed. The attendance upon the sessions has been good and the interest has been intense; but in looking over the Chamber at the present moment it seems to me that I can discover that there is a general feeling of rejoicing among the Members that the general debate is so near a close, and I assure the Members that I shall not detract from their felicity by any prolonged remarks.

I simply want to state my position as a member of the Committee on the Territories. As indicated by the minority report of said committee, I am in favor of admitting New Mexico to the Union of States under the provisions of her proposed constitution, without any limitations whatever, and I am supported in that position by a unanimous recommendation of the Committee on the Territories of the Sixty-first Congress, and a unanimous vote of this House of the Sixty-first Congress, after a free, fair, and full discussion of New Mexico's constitution in its present form. As to Arizona, I am opposed to the admission into the Union of that State with the provisions of the recall of the judiciary written into her fundamental law. The question has been raised as to whether or not that recall provision renders that constitution unrepublican in form. I do not know whether it does or not and I do not care. The consideration of that proposition does not control my action, because I justify my course by holding that I have the moral right as well as the legal right to vote upon this proposition as seemeth best to me for the public good, and I do not believe that this constitution with the recall provision in it will result in the public good, and it may bring great harm to that new Commonwealth, and may bring harm to the older States, on account of the congressional recognition given to that doctrine and considered by many so dangerous.

And, unless I experience a very marked and pronounced change of heart, I will never be a sympathetic student in that great school of political thought that advocates that doctrine. By my vote I propose to extend the freedom and independence of the judiciary instead of limiting it and restricting it by any form of duress. Our forefathers sacrificed much for liberty, freedom, independence, and equal rights for the common people, and we, as Representatives of the common people in the greatest lawmaking body on earth, must concern ourselves in preserving and protecting those rights against the assaults that may come from any and all adversaries by keeping the judiciary above the prejudices, the whims, the vagaries, and the inconsiderate action of unthoughtful men. The opposition to this measure from either or both sides of this Chamber on account of the recall is not because of any desire to infringe or abridge the rights of the people, but to protect those rights. And when Arizona is admitted as a State, and I hope that time will soon come, with this objectionable feature eliminated, she will take her place in the sisterhood of States in perfect unison with the spirit of our American institutions, the perpetuity of which is the only hope of our progressive civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote for the substitute as suggested in the minority report. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, I had not thought of addressing the House upon this question until the repeated references to one of my constituents, whom I take the liberty of saying is one of the most distinguished men of our State, convinced me that in justice to him and in justice to the principles which dominate the political spirit of our State, I ought not to sit silent. Another thing, Mr. Chairman, I did not feel as a Republican that I wanted to sit idly by and see our friends on the other side of the aisle enjoy a monopoly, either "reasonable" or "unreasonable," of the popular ideas of government which obtain to-day throughout the land. Within the last hour I have heard a speech which convinces me that the Democrats do not enjoy that monopoly; if any speech in this Hall since the beginning of this session is entitled to be denominated a defense of standpatism, it is the one just delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON].

In the short time which has been given me I will avail myself of the opportunity of expressing my ideas upon some of the problems of government which confront us to-day. I shall not, therefore, attempt to review the legislative situation here.

As I understand it, the enabling act passed upon the question of population, both the size of the population and its fitness to be admitted into the Union. If I understand the situation correctly, we are merely passing here upon the fact as to whether these constitutions presented by these two States comply with this enabling act, and whether these States present constitutions preserving a republican form of government. We find the men who are in a sense opposed to the most pronounced forms of popular government objecting to certain parts of the Arizona constitution because it provides for the recall of public officers. We find, on the other hand, men who are in favor of the more radical forms of popular government objecting to the New Mexico constitution because it does not provide a more liberal way in which that constitution may be amended.

Now, so far as I am concerned, addressing myself to these two amendments, I think the objections on each side of this question have been greatly exaggerated. It seems to me that the conservatives have become the alarmists in this debate. Why, think of it, my friends! You have listened here to one of the greatest lawyers of the country, representing a constituency from the borough of Brooklyn, who announces with all the eloquence at his command that the adoption of a constitution by the State of Arizona, which provides for the recall of judges, endangers the very Constitution of the United States, effects its repeal, and effectually kills the spirit of our Government. And my handsome friend from California, Mr. KAHN, who would certainly look well leading a revolution, talks to you about this same provision repealing the Constitution of the United States and ending in anarchy. And so we go on all through this debate, until Hamilton himself, who, it is said, yearned for an American house of lords, would have been perfectly satisfied could he have awakened to hear a few echoes from this debate and the accompanying assaults upon the right of the people to rule themselves. These assaults have not stopped with arguments against the recall of judges, but they have extended to the use of the initiative and referendum even in local affairs.

Now, my friends, I am in favor of giving both of these States the right to try the initiative and referendum if they want to. I am not alarmed about it. I possibly would not have worded the initiative and referendum clause as it has been worded in either of these constitutions, but what harm can result in these States, in adopting their constitutions, if they wish to devolve certain powers of legislating upon their people? I favor the trial of the initiative and referendum, because it is one of the evidences of the great forward movement of Democracy in this country of ours. And when I speak of that I have in mind something definite and not merely an intention of engaging in fulsome praise of the power of the people. What I do mean is that in this country of ours, regardless of what procedure we have had for recording the will of the people in the last 25 years, we have made a wonderful progress in developing the powers of a real Democracy. This progress has taken well-defined lines and can be readily traced and observed.

Now, I do not agree with much that has been said here about the original purpose of the Constitution of the United States. Great problems were to be worked out then. It was not the intention of the creators of the Constitution to stifle public opinion. They wrote into that document, as has been cited here many times on this floor in this debate, the fact that all political power resided in the people. What did they mean to do then? They undertook to provide a procedure by which the will of the people might be registered. It was not public opinion, but it was public clamor, that the Constitution of the United States sought to stay until it could be found out whether a substantial majority of the people were really in favor of a particular measure.

Much has been said about the checks which constitutional government placed upon the rights of the people to control the Government, but very little about the checks, more important than any others, which were placed on the power of those who were to be intrusted with the duty of ruling and which were intended to prevent the Government and those who were to administer it from abusing the powers granted to them and thus becoming tyrants, as the Government and its rulers before them had done.

The time is now here when the people feel that the methods outlined in the initiative and referendum measures, in local government, will operate as a check upon the tendency of legislators to fail in their duties. These measures will be an incentive to promptness in carrying out the people's will and a check upon the repeal of the people's laws or in violating their public rights.

It is conceded that in municipal affairs, questions of local taxation, and in the granting of franchises the initiative and referendum are of much value. I assert that the State under the Constitution is the proper unit of local government. It is more effective to-day as the unit of local government than ever before. Government in a sense is nothing more than communication of citizen with citizen and the cooperation which results from communication made manifest through agreements and the machinery of society.

The development of facilities for communication and the consequent bringing of people together has made the State governments more closely associated with the people than were the city governments of a generation ago. There is no reason why the procedure found beneficial in city governments may not be found so in the control of State affairs by the State's electorate.

If it be right for the people of a county to decide whether that county shall issue bonds to aid in constructing a railroad, it is also right that all the people of the State shall decide whether the State shall permit laws authorizing such bond issues.

If it be right for the people of a city to express an opinion as to whether a railroad shall have a franchise through that particular city, then it is right for the people of that city and every other city of the State to have something to say about the general laws relative to railway franchises and their control throughout the State.

If it be right for the people to control the levy of taxes for local schools, as it certainly is, and the local public schools are the corner stones of the foundation upon which rest the universities and other higher education, then the people have a right to a direct voice in the levy of the university and other taxes for higher education. Indeed, it may be laid down as almost axiomatic that the different parts of every State are so closely connected under our modern forms of society that each is interested in the other, and no general law should be enacted without consulting each and every part of the State. But it is said the people can not work out the details of these laws, for laws must be technically drawn. It might be a sufficient answer to say that neither can any considerable number of the legislators in any legislative body frame laws. But this objection brings us to another one, and I shall be pleased to answer both together. It has been frequently asserted in this debate that the initiative and the referendum and the recall are the devices of demagogues and of those who are seeking office by advocating popular theories.

But I shall be able to show, I think, that the ablest advocates of these governmental theories are men who are not candidates for office and who would not accept office; they have been humble workers, though sometimes mighty ones, in the ranks of the great movements which have accomplished the best things of our modern legislation. Indeed, for each and every man who has been prominent in advancing these and other measures tending to a wider democratic government who has sought or accepted office as a result of his public service I will show you 15 professional politicians who have maintained themselves in office and in the favor of some political machine by decrying popular government. The people are growing tired of too much political expediency and too little political efficiency in the affairs of public business.

Over and over again the assertion is made, principally on the Democratic side of this House, that this is a Government of political parties.

Mr. Chairman, I deny that statement in the sense in which it is so often made. The great forward movement of democracy which has taken place in this country in the last quarter of a century is not due to any party; it has affected both parties alike. It is here—and for the most part in spite of political machines—because it emanated from the hearts and minds of the great people of this country.

The mistake of the hour on the part of the Democratic Party is placing party caucus above the welfare of the country. Every day we are treated to the spectacle of some statesman rising on the other side of the House and delivering a panegyric on "my party," as he terms it, referring to the Democratic caucus and the Lord Almighty in the same breath, treating both as divine institutions, and too many times placing the former above the latter in importance.

But, Mr. Chairman, the evils of the oath-bound political caucus in Congress and outside of it have been fully as great as all the good accomplished by the parties which have adopted and have been ruled by it. At some time in the future I shall endeavor to discuss this subject more in detail, but I shall not do so now. I shall content myself with the assertion, that to my mind the strongest attribute of the initiative and referendum is that it encourages citizens to form organizations independent of political parties, for the purpose of framing and advocating the enactment of laws in the interest of society in general. These activities of our citizenship constitutes one of the strongest forces of our democracy and the initiative and referendum gives it life and form and provides the procedure whereby its influence may gain more important results than ever before.

Now, I said in the beginning the name of Mr. William Allen White had been mentioned several times in this debate. His books are read wherever the English language is spoken and in many other countries besides. He did write "What is the matter with Kansas," but that article was not an indictment of popular government; it was an assault on the political caucus, a system which had turned over to hungry politicians the control of a sentimental public uprising which had its origin in a correct diagnosis of public ills. Mr. White has contributed much in the last few years to the literature of public questions, and I desire to read into the RECORD his description of the development of our modern democracy and the manner of its workings relative to organizations of our people independent of political parties and their ability to accomplish legislation. I read from his book, The Old Order Changeth, written in 1910, pages 51 to 64, inclusive:

Indeed, the growth of fundamental democracy in this country is astonishing. Thirty years ago the secret ballot was regarded as a passing craze by professional politicians. Twenty years ago it was a vital issue in nearly every American State. To-day the secret ballot is universal in American politics. Ten years ago the direct primary was the subject of an academic discussion in the University of Michigan by a young man named LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin. Now it is in actual operation in over two-thirds of our American States, and more than half of the American people use the direct primary as a weapon of self-government. Five years ago the recall was a piece of freak legislation in Oregon. To-day more American citizens are living under laws giving them the power of recall than were living under the secret ballot when Garfield came to the White House, and many times more people have the power to recall certain public officers to-day than had the advantages of the direct-primary form of party nominations when Theodore Roosevelt came to Washington. The referendum is only five years behind the primary. Prophecy, with these facts before one, becomes something more than a rash guess.

The democracy has the executive and the legislative branches of the State and Federal governments under its direct control, for in the nomination of a majority of the Members of the House and of the Senate the personification of property is unimportant. By making the party a legalized State institution, by paying for the party primaries with State taxes, by requiring candidates at primaries to file their expense accounts and a list of their contributors, as is done in some States; by limiting the amount to be spent, as is done in certain States; and by guaranteeing a secret vote and a fair count, the State has broken the power of money in politics. Capital is not eliminated from politics, but it is hampered and circumscribed, and is not the dominant force that it was 10 years ago. Then the political machine was financed by capital invested in public-service corporations and was continually trying to avoid the responsibility of its public partnership. Then the political machine quietly sold special privileges to public-service corporations. Now the political machine is in a fair way to be reduced to mere political scrap iron by the rise of the people. To-day in States having the primary under the State control the corporation candidate for any public office is handicapped. The men elected to the United States Senate from States having the northern type of primary generally have been free men, free from machine and corporation taint. Under the primary system any clean, quick-witted man in these States can defeat the corporation senatorial candidate at the primary if the people desire to defeat him. This advantage alone is worth the cost of the primary—something like $100,000 for each State biennially. Moreover, the fact that governors and State officers, legislators and county officers also are free men makes the primary invaluable in terms of money. Taft and Bryan, the two men who have less money behind them than any of their opponents, the two men whom the "interests" did not wish to see nominated, headed the tickets of the two great parties in 1908. And when those United States Senators who win their nominations and elections without the railroad and public-service corporations, and win in the face of the opposition of these organizations of capital, when these Senators begin to name Federal judges, the Supreme Court will begin to reverse itself and the people will capture the lower Federal court—the last citadel of capital. But that is almost an "irridescent dream."

However, just now the people are finding a way around the legislative veto of the State courts. And this they are doing more generally than may be realized by many people. The voters are taking two methods of circumventing the legislative veto of the courts—first, by amending their State constitutions, or making new constitutions, and, second, by direct legislation, or the modification of it known as the initiative and referendum. State courts are elective, and therefore are afraid of majorities. They can not declare constitutional amendments unconstitutional and they handle laws adopted by a direct vote of the people with great care. Hence, the prevalence of the constitutional amendments in American States and the growth of the initiative and referendum from Maine to California. The tendency to amend a State constitution is not a local phenomenon. In 1908 California voted on 18 amendments and Missouri voted on 8. If a State may be said to have a tendency to amend its constitution when it has voted upon one or more amendments at nearly every biennial election for half a dozen years, then the tendency is fairly marked in California, Alabama, Utah, Massachusetts, Oregon, Rhode Island, Texas, Minnesota, New Jersey, Montana, Florida, Maryland, and Mississippi; in New York, where the amendment is a slow and difficult process; in Vermont, where there is agitation for a constitutional convention; in Michigan, where a new constitution has just been adopted; in Illinois; in Maine, where the initiative and referendum has just been instituted by constitutional amendment; and in New Hampshire, Louisiana, Missouri, and Kansas. Where the habit of amending the State constitution becomes settled, as it is in California and Missouri, the habit amounts to a public referendum of many laws, and from the standpoint of direct legislation and government by the majority this habit is praiseworthy. If, however, the guaranty of absolutely unrestricted capital is considered more important than the majority rule, the habit of amending the constitution is dangerous and revolutionary.

The value of the initiative and referendum depends also upon the point from which it is viewed. In certain quarters politics is considered the science of government of the many by the few. Also a government is considered excellent when it protects investment, when it makes the right of contract more important than the welfare of citizens, when it protects vested rights even after they become vested wrongs. In those quarters the initiative and referendum, which is coming into American government as surely as the secret ballot came, will be deemed a dangerous menace to our institutions. Certainly it is a departure from the idea of a government by the few which inspired the fathers of the Federal Constitution when Chief Justice John Marshall gave the Federal judiciary the final veto on all laws passed by State or national legislatures.

And the issue should be met candidly. The friends of the movement for direct legislation should admit frankly that the purpose of their cause is twofold: First, to compel legislatures to act quickly and without evasion; and, second, to circumvent the veto of such courts as are elective, and hence dependent upon popular majorities, and to put whatever righteousness there is in a definitely registered expression of popular will before such courts as are not elective to stay them in their vetoes. For the veto power of the American courts over legislation—under the assumed rights to declare legislation "unconstitutional"—is one of the most ruthless checks upon democracy permitted by any civilized people. European kings and courts do not have such reactionary power; yet in the end it seems to make for righteousness, because under that power in America people have developed a patience and a conscience and a patriotic self-abnegation which fits them to progress in the light of the vision within them. So the initiative and referendum—a most outlandish phrase—which is coming into State governments and city governments all over the country, will be the instrument of a self-restrained people. It will not be the weapon of the mob.

Maine and Missouri have adopted the initiative and referendum as a part of their constitutions. South Dakota, Oregon, Oklahoma, Utah, and Montana have the initiative and referendum as a part of either their fundamental law or upon their statutes. Nevada has the referendum, and is about to vote on the proposition to establish the initiative and referendum. Illinois and Texas have the advisory initiative; in the case of Illinois it is enacted under a law called the public-policy law; and in the case of Texas it is in the primary election law, which forbids party platforms to indorse proposed legislation that is not first voted upon at the primaries and indorsed by the people. Nebraska gives the right of initiative and referendum to her cities. Kansas grants the referendum on all franchises to cities. Arkansas has submitted a constitutional amendment enabling the establishment of the initiative and referendum by statute.

The movement for constitutional State-wide laws providing for the initiative and referendum is now well under way in 30 States of the Union. The movement never has been defeated by the people of a State when it has been presented to them in a simple form for a direct vote. The Legislatures of Wisconsin, of Minnesota, of Iowa, of Oregon, of Mississippi, of South Dakota, of Nebraska, of Delaware, of North Carolina, of California, of Oklahoma, of Washington, of Idaho, of Kansas, of Texas, of Illinois, of North Dakota, of Missouri, of Montana, of Colorado, of New York, of Massachusetts, of Tennessee, of Maine, and of Georgia have granted either the initiative and referendum or one of them to certain cities in these 25 States.

Thus we see that while the secret ballot in the Nation is universal and the primary prevails in two-thirds of the American States the movement for direct legislation has gained foothold in 25 States and is directly before the people, either as a constitutional amendment, a pledge of the dominant party, or as a pledge of the majority of the members elected to the legislature or in the message of the governor in 5 other States, making a total of 30 American Commonwealths wherein there is an aggressive movement toward direct legislation. It is noteworthy that the movement has followed the direct primary movement and has doubled its strength biennially since 1901. And back of the movement for the initiative and referendum and the primary and the secret ballot, waiting silently for its summons to come to the active service of democracy, like Mme. Defarge knitting in the wrongs of the people, stands the recall.

So the appearance of the recall in the cities of a dozen States within a little over a year should make those statesmen nervous who look forward to the time when the country will go back to the good old days. For this tightening grip of the people upon their State governments, as evidenced in some form in every American State, has been an intelligent, gradual, well-directed growth of popular power. Its direction has been wise, for from the beginning to the present there has been no spasm of public indignation followed by reaction. Whose wisdom directed it? No man's name is connected with it. No party nor propaganda has been behind the movement. It operates in Democratic States and in Republican States with equal efficiency. And in no American State has the fight been abandoned, either for the secret ballot, the publicity of party financing, the primary, the initiative and referendum, or the recall, after it has become a serious issue of any group of men of any party. The movement is one of the largest vital things in our politics to-day, but politicians generally—even the best of them—do not seem to understand it. It is as unobtrusive as the wonderful miracle of growth. And in all the heavens, the sea, and the earth this movement has no other prototype except the miracle of growth that we pass by unnoticed every day of our lives. It is growth—spiritual growth in the hearts of the American people. It is a big moral movement in democracy.

For each one of these four reforms—the secret ballot, the publicity of party finance, the direct primary, and direct legislation—requires a broader scope for the individual's concern than he would have under the old order. The man who refuses to sell his vote when bribery is a "conventional crime" is considering some interest other than his own. The man who votes for a direct primary foregoes a place in the aristocracy. The man who demands publicity in campaign finance knows that he is cutting the revenue from under his own party and that there will be less fun in the campaign. The man who urges direct legislation puts a vast power in the hands of his neighbors to control him. Only as men have faith in the force outside themselves that makes for righteousness will they surrender personal prerogatives to the public good as the people have been surrendering their individual advantage in this democratic movement. The people are controlling themselves. Altruism is gaining strength for some future struggle with the atomic force of egoism in society.

But who has led the people in this journey toward democracy? Who has directed the movement? Who has performed the miracle of democratic growth in the hearts of the people? Here it is—the great surrender which is bringing the great reward—an old equation in the arithmetic of Providence. But who has put the problem and worked it out? No man—no group of men, even—has done it. Yet here it is—no more strange or mysterious than any other miracle of growth about us that our eyes see and our souls ignore.

The good will of the people—the widening faith of men in one another, in the combined wisdom of the numerical majority—indicates the presence of a human trust that only may come to a people with broadening humanity, widening human love for one's fellows. And if God is life, as the prophets say, then love is God, and this growing abnegation of self to democracy is a divinely planted instinct—one with the miracles of life about us. If this is true, if the growth of democracy in this country is as natural as the inexplicable wonders of growth in the woods and fields and cities of men, then democracy may be trusted. For its title is secure, and so we may understand certain signs of the times. For what do we see in this program of American democracy?

It is as old-fashioned as the fog. Indeed, what is the fight of our democracy against unfair competition but the cause against him that "taketh reward against the innocent"? What is the contest of the people against overcapitalization but a struggle with him that "putteth his money out to usury"? What is the campaign of all decent Americans for simple business honesty but scorn for "the reprobate"? What is this broadening intelligence of the Republic, which faced a panic and did not flinch from its conviction of righteousness, but "him that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not"? The tendency to democracy is a tendency to altruism, and altruism is love of kind, and God is love. The social, political, and economic forces released by steam—democracy and capital—are in the crucible of our national life. They are fusing. But there will be no explosion. For when democracy comes to the problems that have baffled other nations, if democracy holds true to faith, true to its instinct, we may expect democracy to be just.

But those who would use democracy for an end, who would make it serve them by flattering it, by making it mad with power, those who would teach democracy the doctrine of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, even against those who have oppressed the people, they are democracy's foes, for—

"Except the Lord shall build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Again, in this same book, on page 131, Mr. White discusses the modern movements of our social and industrial life and their effect upon the Government. It is a wonderful array of facts and statistics put in attractive form. Chapter VI, pages 131 to 146, inclusive:

THE LEAVEN IN THE NATIONAL LUMP.

Theoretically this Nation lives under a government of laws sustained by a written Constitution. Practically it is a government by public sentiment. This does not mean that it is a government by public clamor. But it does mean that whenever the people have believed in a public policy, whether it was the direct election of the President by the people, or the emancipation of slaves, or the issue of greenbacks, or the acquisition of colonies, or the direct election of United States Senators, and have believed in these things deeply enough to sacrifice their own personal comfort for them—to fight for them in short—the Constitution has never been strong enough to hold them back. The Constitution was meant to suppress clamor, not sentiment; the difference between the two expressions being—broadly—that clamor is the desire to reform some one else, and public sentiment is the desire to reform one's self. Public clamor is essentially selfish—tyrannical. Real public sentiment is essentially unselfish—democratic. For democracy is, at base, altruism expressed in terms of self-government. And so to know what kind of a National Government we really have in America it is as necessary to study our public sentiment as it is to examine our laws and consider our written Constitution.

For while a city or State may exhibit some sporadic legalization of clamor the area of the Nation is too large geographically, mentally, and morally for sheer clamor often to get legal recognition. A democracy must be big. Size is a fundamental part of it; and our very bigness here in America has prevented many vital mistakes. Clamor, from California to Maine and from Florida to Oregon, however loud and terrifying, generally wears itself out before the machinery of law can stamp it and authorize it. So, as a rule, our Federal laws are observed—not because the National Government is so ruthless, but because its laws are just.

And in taking inventory of our national progress during the decade or two past we must consider, along with our new laws, the public sentiment that made them and that sustains them and is demanding the extension of these laws into larger areas; for the sentiment that made the laws is more important than the laws themselves, and the study of the organization and growth of sentiment is an important part of the work of the student of government, for much error prevails about the way this Nation thinks. Commonly newspapers are supposed to be the great factories of sentiment. Gentlemen in the pillory of public sentiment blame their discomfiture upon the newspapers and magazines; and if these gentlemen are in funds at the moment they buy other newspapers and subsidize other magazines, and accomplish nothing. For newspapers and books and magazines do not make sentiment; they merely voice sentiment. Often they make clamor, but public sentiment grows. It is as evanescent as the wind and as resistless as the waves. It may be dammed, but not permanently checked. And in America public sentiment grows after the manner of the genius of the people—by parliamentary organization. Given an idea in common to three Americans, and the best known becomes president, the most effective, secretary, and the richest of the three treasurer. These are faith, hope, and charity.

"To believe your own thought, to believe that what is true for you in your private heart is true for all men—that is genius," says Emerson, and admonishes us, "Speak your latent conviction, and it shall be the universal sense; for the inmost in due time becomes the outmost." So public sentiment grows in America. An idea comes to a man and simultaneously to his brother a thousand miles away, or perhaps in the next block. The idea draws them together. When they meet there is a third and a fourth with them, and they organize. The idea has become a force in the world. It has the seed of events in it. If men are willing to sacrifice their time for it, to give up their comforts for it, to live for it, and, if need be, to die for it, the group that fostered it multiplies by division, in some curious way, into a multitude of groups, all pressing the idea into life. There is the State association, two, three, perhaps four, State associations all advocating the righteousness of the idea. Then comes a call for a national association and the wildfire is out. State associations spring up everywhere. A national bureau is set up promoting the idea, fostering its propaganda, bound to its work in the world, and then follows a national law, and the private organization becomes a public institution.

Ideas in various stages of incubation may be seen all over the country. Where the demand for pure food was 10 years ago the contest against tuberculosis is to-day. And 10 years from now tuberculosis may be as arch an enemy to the laws of the Republic as adulterated food is to-day. And here is another curious thing about the advancement of ideas: Just as the same hundred men or so are the directors of all our big banks, of all our great railroads, and of many of our public-service corporations, directing the centripetal forces of American society, so another group of a hundred men, more or less, is found directing many of the societies, associations, conventions, assemblies, and leagues behind the benevolent movements—the centrifugal forces of American society. It is Morgan, the Gould's, the Harriman interests, Winslow Pierce, Ryan, Stillman, and their associates against Seth Low, William Dudley Foulke, the Pinchot interests, Samuel McCune Lindsay, Jane Addams, Clinton Rogers Woodruff and their associates. They are captains of two opposing groups—capital and democracy—each necessary to the life of the Nation, each performing his organic function in our body politic—the assimilation of the great discovery of steam into our social body.

Thus our history is made by men organized in parliamentary form, bound together by an idea, often opposing a force not always organized, save by the instinct of fear under attack, which makes the community of interest in business and in politics. For instance, one of the most important laws put on our Federal statutes in two decades is the Hepburn railroad law. It prohibits discrimination between individual shippers reasonably well. It is correcting a serious and sinister abuse in our national commerce. The law is fairly well observed. The sentiment of the people is behind it. Here is the leaven that changed the national lump. Before the passage of the Hepburn law there was an organization among American business men known as the Interstate Commerce Convention. It was composed of State and local commercial and trade organizations, boards of trade, fruit growers, lumbermen, and the like, in 34 States; and in addition to these it comprised 35 national associations, like the American Hereford Cattle Breeders, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Paint, Oil, and Varnish Association, the National Hay Association, and similar organizations that one rarely hears of in the newspapers. This association of associations, called the Interstate Commerce Convention, met from time to time and formulated its demands. In those demands was sacrifice for some associations, abnegation of special privileges by others, selfishness in some quarters, and meanness in others, but, on the whole, what they asked for was fair. They appealed to the Nation. The people were convinced. The newspapers began to voice the sentiment of the people. The President recognized the sentiment and realized its justice. The railroads controlled the machinery of politics. They had hundreds of subsidized newspapers. They hired men to establish bureaus and to write controversial articles and paid editors to print a refutation of the justice of the shippers' demands. Money was spent without stint. Millions might have been used if they had been usable. The Interstate Commerce Convention had raised $22,855.

Gossip said at the time, and the lobbyists for the railroads boasted, that they had two millions. Probably they had no such sum; but they might have had ten. And yet the $22,000 of the shippers was enough. Half as much would have done as well. For money in America does not make sentiment. Printing presses are as useless as cheese presses in making sentiment. Public sentiment comes out of the consciences of the people, and it can not be fed to them in any sort of medicinal form from newspapers, magazines, or books. So the railroads surrendered with all their money. The Hepburn law was enacted. The genius of the people for parliamentary organization, outside of constitutions and law, saved them. They sacrificed something—did these hundreds of thousands of people of the organization—not money, but time, and convenience, and special privileges, passes, inside rates, rebates, concessions, and whatnot of the crumbs of commerce, and by giving to the common good they won for the common good.

Take another instance. The people of this country were eating poisoned food. The president, the secretary, and the treasurer met, discussed the matter, and the Pure Food Association, greatly to be sniffed at by the intrenched forces of culinary poison, began its work. It had no money. It had no newspapers. Newspapers and magazines 10 years ago were taking millions of dollars in advertising from manufacturers of improper foods and drugs. But the pure-food show began to appear in American cities and towns, just as the tuberculosis exhibit is moving over the country to-day. The people learned the truth. The wholesale grocers' associations took up the fight, and in spite of all the money behind the manufacturers of the adulterated and poisonous food, the pure food and drug act passed Congress in June, 1906, and became a law. The sacrifice of hundreds of men and women, who were willing to give their time and their name to the cause of pure food for the masses, was more potent than all the legislative machinery, all the lobby of retailers, all the flood of telegrams from cattle growers, and all the forces of selfishness.

Observe still another illustration of the force of public sentiment in our American life. There is the National Civil Service Reform League. The forces of plunder and graft in the United States hate that league and all its work. The high-caste politicians of the States, of the cities, and of the Nation make this league the particular object of their curses. If organized politics, with all its power and with all its machinery, could stop the spread of the civil service, it would be a dead issue. Yet this little handful of men in the Civil Service League—most of them highly incompetent in the machinations of practical politics—has organized the sentiment of the American people for justice in the public service, and as a result during the last eight years much has been accomplished. In 1901, 1,600 positions in the War Department were restored to the classified service after removal from it in 1899; in 1902, 250 employees of the temporary government in Cuba were added to the classified list, and labor regulations were made for the Washington departments. The next year the shipping commissioners were restored to the classified service and the Philippine teachers added, and in 1904 the classification of the subordinates in the Isthmian Commission began, and the year following the whole labor service was put under control of the Civil Service Commission. Since then the fourth-class postmasters have been protected, putting presidential postmasters under the merit system; under this rule they are reappointed without reference to congressional indorsement or opposition, if their records are in the first grade of the service. And under the influence of the National Civil Service Commission we are taking the first census ever taken in America not compiled by spoilsmen. The States of Wisconsin, Illinois, New Jersey, Colorado, and Kansas have adopted laws which protect certain employees in certain public institutions from removal for political reasons, and in a measure establishing the merit system. Moreover, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Des Moines, Cedar Rapids, Atlanta, Baltimore, Duluth, St. Louis, Wilmington, N. C., Oklahoma City, Portland, Philadelphia, Scranton, Pittsburg, Norfolk, and all of the 60 cities operating under the commission plan of government have established civil-service rules for one or more of the city departments. All of this leaven of righteousness is worked by public sentiment, and the particular organism that promotes that sentiment is the National Civil Service League, which never spends over $9,000 a year. Money plays a small part in directing the actual current of American public life.

In 1901 and the two years following commercial bodies and labor unions all over the land began petitioning Congress to establish some sort of a bureau of commerce; and in 1903 the Department of Commerce and Labor was established. It marks the greatest advance in our Government's relation to the individual that has been taken for a generation, for the right of the Government to examine the books and accounts of every American business concern and, upon its own judgment of expediency, to withhold or make public the result of its examination, in effect is legalized. The precedence of the common good over the private rights of capital in even private business is established in law. This establishment makes all business public business, so far as its status before the law is concerned. The altruism of democracy has no stronger fortress in America than the law upon which the Department of Commerce and Labor is founded; yet it was founded without excitement, without clamor, because the president, the secretary, and the treasurer of a thousand business organizations—willing to reform themselves, to subject themselves to inspection and regulation—asked for it.

And now we come to the core of the so-called reform movement in America, for it is at bottom a national movement. What we find in ballot laws and democratic tendencies in States, what we find in regulative and restrictive legislation in the various Commonwealths, what we find in reshaping of charters and remaking of municipal governments, are but the local symptoms of our national adolescence. They are growing pains of the new life that is upon us. When President Roosevelt interfered in the anthracite coal strike, early in his administration, he did not create the sentiment which backed him up so loyally in his extraconstitutional act. A score of organizations for a decade had been making sentiment which recognized the common good as paramount to the private right. The right of property as against the right of the people was a shell. It was worm-eaten by public sentiment, and however the coal operators might chatter about their divine rights the real divine right was that of the people to keep warm at a reasonable price. Chief among the organizations propagating the right of the people to industrial peace was and is the National Civic Federation. It is composed largely of rich men who have vision to see that they must surrender to the common good much of their vested rights, and generally these men find joy in it. Among other members of the federation are labor leaders who see that they, too, and their constituents must give in before the common good, and take joy in the giving.

That sentiment is abroad in America; it is the soul of our new-born democracy; so that one who looks at the large national movements of the decade now closing will find that those movements which have become national laws are laws looking to the distribution rather than the accumulation of wealth. Practically all the large national organizations which jam the trains annually going to their conventions are fundamentally altruistic. There are a million Masons in the United States. There are 6,000,000 members of fraternal insurance companies, distributing annually nearly $6,000,000 in sick and death benefits and giving almost as much more in free fraternal service from man to man in time of trouble. For this democratic tendency of our times does not express itself well in dollars and cents, but always it is ready to respond to any call, whether political or social or economic, when the voice is clear and the motive unblurred. When Theodore Roosevelt came to the White House he merely saw the obvious thing, and did it, and became a force for righteousness—the first leader the Nation has developed since Lincoln—because he had a righteous people behind him.

The important measures accomplished by the Roosevelt administration are these: The regulation of corporations, the beginning of the Panama Canal, the enactment of the pure-food law, the reclamation of the deserts by irrigation, the preservation of the forests and water rights, the extension of the civil service, the establishment of peace under the Portsmouth treaty. These may be called the Roosevelt policies; yet they are not his; he merely adopted them. He found in every case a strong parliamentary organization working for these things. Moreover, in every case, these organizations were poor in funds and rich in men and were fighting intrenched interests rich in funds if often poor in men. The struggle of the Interstate Commerce Convention, with its pitiful little $22,000 against the millions of the railroads, has been noted. The same forces that fought the Hepburn law and the establishment of the Department of Commerce and Labor opposed the Panama Canal undertaking—for the canal will play havoc with transcontinental rates—and the packers and poison dealers who opposed the pure food and drug law were beaten by the same little David, in another coat, who slew the railroad Goliath in the first two battles. The irrigation congress had to fight the cattle men and the sheep men who had the ranges and desired to keep them, but the men with vision won, and the fields were cut into "quarters" and "eighties," and the desert blossomed as the rose. In the contest for the preservation of the forests the timber cutters have had nine points of the law—they have had possession—and they have had unlimited funds; and the American Forestry Association, the Appalachian National Forest Association, the International Society of Arboriculture, the Joint Committee on Conservation, and the Society of American Foresters have had less funds than it takes to give a national lumbermen's banquet. Yet the feeble folk built their homes among the rocks of simple justice and are winning, and inevitably must win.

When he established peace at Portsmouth, President Roosevelt was not alone. There was with him the sentiment of a Nation fostered by the American Peace Society, maintaining 18 lecturers in the field, the Association for International Conciliation, the Universal Peace Union, and the Lake Mohonk Peace Conference, not to mention 32,000,000 of church communicants in the Nation. The history of the Roosevelt administration, with its wonderful advance in our national institutions, has been the history of the expression of the people rather than the growth of the people. Like Homer, when he "smote his bloomin' lyre," Theodore Roosevelt found the people bursting with pent-up righteousness, "and what he thought he might require, he went and took." And yet without the leadership of Theodore Roosevelt, without his personality to dramatize the growing righteousness of the people, it is not difficult to imagine what calamity of misdirected radicalism might have been visited upon the Nation. If that righteous wrath of the people at the selfish forces of society had not found expression through President Roosevelt, it would have been voiced through demagogues at an awful cost to the Nation. His genius lies not in making sentiment, but in directing it into sane, conservative, workable laws.

In the light of these things constituting as they do the greatest things accomplished in our time—the real evolution of our Government and civilization—can there be any doubt about the wisdom of giving the people the right to organize and to advance legislation demanded by the conditions of the times? The initiative furnishes them the legal and orderly way to do this. They will use it as they are now using it in the States where it has been ordained. Certainly it furnishes no excuse for the condemnation of these Territories which seek to come into the Union with constitutions giving their people this power.

And now, a word as to the recall of public officers. The power of the electorate to control its officers is so closely connected with the power to legislate that in principle there can be but little difference. All history furnishes us no instances where either has been used by the mob or the rabble; but history is replete with instances where the refusal of governments to provide orderly means for the redress of public wrongs has resulted in riot, anarchy, and the terrors of armed rebellion. The laws of Mexico furnished no method by which Diaz could be recalled, so he was recalled by the sword. So it has ever been in history. It was Benjamin Harrison who said:

> The man whose protection from wrong rests wholly upon the benevolence of another man or of a Congress is a slave, a man without rights.

A free people will redress their wrongs peaceably by orderly methods provided by laws, or they will redress them by force. The freest and most orderly government is one which furnishes ample means for the expression of the popular will.

If judges must indulge in judicial legislation to make the laws meet the needs of the time, then the people should be heard as to who shall constitute their interpreters of the law.

The removal of officers by trial of impeachment is adequate as a punishment for the officer who has failed to do his duty, but as an immediate remedy for public wrongs it is limping and halt. No judgment can be obtained usually in the case of local officers until after the expiration of the term for which the offending officers were elected.

As to the judiciary, I have failed to hear any good reason urged against the recall of judges that does not apply equally to the recall of other officers. I have heard none which does not apply equally to the recall and the election of judges. I am perfectly willing to let the merits of the two systems stand on the records of the judges now serving in the country who have been elected, compared with those, now serving, who hold their positions by appointment. The argument that the recall would be resorted to by disappointed litigants and others to embarrass the court is ridiculous. In the first place, the disappointed litigant would gain nothing by the recall of the judge who had decided against him, as the judge's recall would not revoke his former judgment, and none of these elements of dissatisfaction would be more effective in the recall than they are against elective judges. The recall of judges could only be used to check judicial legislation or the conduct of courts in construing laws of great public interest, which amounted to the same thing. While all admit instances of judicial legislation are far too frequent to be tolerated, it must also be admitted that under our constitutional form of government it is the duty of the judges to construe the laws to suit present needs and the conditions of society and the people.

If "applied" or interpreted law is expected to meet the demands of the time, what harm or injustice can there be in submitting some authority to arbitrate these questions of public policy of the people, even by so indirect a method as the right to change the interpreters of the laws? If the false interpreter of laws can not be removed, the Constitution itself will, in his hands, become an instrument of oppression and a charter of special privileges and eventually a reproach to the Nation.

The recall of judges who willfully pervert its solemn mandates is the only sane remedy ever proposed for the prevention of judicial legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

[Mr. SAUNDERS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 18. Joint resolution authorizing free or reduced transportation to members of the Grand Army of the Republic and others whenever attending regular annual encampments, reunions, or conventions, and for other purposes;

S. 1095. An act to authorize the surveyor of the District of Columbia to adopt the system of designating land in the District of Columbia in force in the office of the assessor of said District;

S. 1082. An act to receive arrearages of taxes due to the District of Columbia to July 1, 1908, at 6 per cent interest per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs;

S. 19. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding title of the United States to lots 3 and 4, square 103, in the city of Washington, D. C.;

S. 29. An act to amend paragraph 43 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902;

S. 1087. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better registration of births in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1907;

S. 30. An act to provide for the extension of Kenyon Street from Seventeenth Street to Mount Pleasant Street and for the extension of Seventeenth Street from Kenyon Street to Irving Street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

S. 1094. An act for the widening of Sixteenth Street NW. at Piney Branch, and for other purposes;

S. 306. An act to confirm the name of Commodore Barney Circle for the circle located at the eastern end of Pennsylvania Avenue SE., in the District of Columbia;

S. 21. An act for the relief of Ida A. Chew, owner of lot 112, square 721, Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment of damages on account of changes of grade due to construction of the Union Station, District of Columbia;

S. 32. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the extension of Newton Place NW. from New Hampshire Avenue to Georgia Avenue, and to connect Newton Place in Gass's subdivision with Newton Place in Whitney Close subdivision," approved February 21, 1910;

S. 1090. An act providing for guides in the District of Columbia and defining their duties;

S. 267. An act providing for assisting indigent persons, other than natives, in the District of Alaska;

S. 12. An act to give effect to the provisions of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the fisheries in waters contiguous to the United States and the Dominion of Canada, signed at Washington on April 1, 1908, and ratified by the United States Senate April 13, 1908;

S. 1627. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across and over the Arkansas River, and for other purposes;

S. 2003. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make partial payments for work already done under public contracts;

S. 940. An act granting to the city of Los Angeles certain rights of way in, over, and through certain lands and national forests in the State of California; and

S. 2434. An act providing for an increase of salary of the United States marshal for the district of Connecticut.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LANGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, the last Congress passed an enabling act under which the two Territories have taken certain action. The Territory of New Mexico has conformed to the requirements of the act, and unless there is some further legislation by Congress it will be admitted as a State in the Union. It does not appear that the Territory of Arizona has complied with the requirements of the act, because its constitution has not yet been approved in the way set out, and unless it shall be approved by the President or unless there shall be further action by Congress it will not be admitted as a State. I am willing to stand by the enabling act, but I am not disposed to stretch the principles of correct government any further in the direction of the admission of the Territory of Arizona.

At the special election held to pass upon the constitution which involved the admission of that Territory there were only 16,000 votes cast. I hesitate to increase the inequality which now exists in our Government and to confer upon another State, with a very small population, which has only cast 16,000 votes upon the important question of its admission into the Union, an equal power in the Senate with that exercised by the great State of New York, which casts 1,600,000 votes at an election.

It is attempted to balance here—and it seems to be for the purpose to give this bill a judicial pose—an imagined fault in the constitution of New Mexico, in order to offset a very grave and vital defect in the constitution of Arizona. It is said that the constitution of New Mexico is not sufficiently flexible and that the people should pass again upon the question of the manner in which they shall amend it, but it was conclusively shown here in debate by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] that the constitution of New Mexico could be more easily amended than the constitutions of a majority of the States in the Union. Now, what is that used to offset? Arizona provides in its constitution for a recall of the judges, something that I believe would not merely in the long run result in the destruction of a republican form of government, but which I believe would be entirely subversive of civil government. I do not care to vote to admit that Territory, simply saying that she shall pass upon the question whether she will have this obnoxious provision in her constitution or not. I do not propose to agree that Congress shall put itself in a position of indifference or in a doubtful or equivocal attitude and pass a solemn law, saying that the people of Arizona should pass upon the proposition whether they will have the recall of judges in their constitution or not, and that whichever way they decide the State shall come into the Union.

I am not in favor of the general principle of recall of even political officers. I believe that we consult the omens altogether too much; that the tendency of our statesmen is to go out and see which way the wind is blowing rather than, during the time in which the people have intrusted power to them, conscientiously performing the business that comes before them in the light of the great and true principles of government. [Applause.]

In a speech which I made some two weeks ago I pointed out some of the possible consequences of a recall of political officers. I then said that if the recall had been operative in the United States in 1862 I believed that Abraham Lincoln would have been recalled. You will remember that there had then been a long series of unsuccessful battles. The great organs of newspaper opinion in the country were ranged against him, and even the abolitionists were opposed to him. He had been elected to office by a minority of the people of the country, and there is a probability that even a greater majority than that cast for other candidates would have voted in favor of recalling him if the question had been put at that hour of his unpopularity; and, if I am correct, we should have seen some of the most glorious history that has ever been recorded spoiled in the making. We should probably have seen our Union dismembered and obloquy take the place of as great and pure a fame as can be found among the children of men. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MCCALL. I have only 25 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will he yield just for a question?

Is it not a fact that all of those forces that the gentleman thinks would have caused the recall of President Lincoln operated against him during the campaign in which he was reelected?

Mr. MCCALL. Well, not to discuss that further, everybody who is familiar with the history of the country knows that there was a great change in conditions and of sentiment between the summer of 1862 and November, 1864. I can not take the time to show the differences that had occurred.

Now, one would think, from the air of wisdom and of invention with which the recall and the referendum and the initiative have been presented on this floor, that they were modern discoveries. Why, it is the old question of direct against representative government which has been on trial from the earliest historical times. The framers of the Constitution were entirely familiar with it. The system of direct government had been in force among the most intelligent people of the world. We are apt to think that because we have made great inventions and discoveries, therefore we have immunity to violate sound political principles. Advancement is of two kinds—the physical advancement, such as we have had, such as has been so rapid and revolutionary in this country in the last century, and moral advancement, an advancement which would affect the operations of the human mind. The first kind, as I have said, has been great and rapid in the last century. But in order to see the second kind one must look at periods of time remote from each other. It is almost imperceptible, because the same impulses and the same motives animate mankind to-day as animated them in the time of the ancient Greek.

Take the ancient democracies. The Greeks were more civilized than we are. Take those consummate flowers of civilization, art and literature, and as to them they were ahead of us. As you go through one of the art galleries of the Old World, looking at the masterpieces, and see in the distance some remnant of the work of even an unknown Greek sculptor, you are held enchained in wonder, and what must the work of Phidias and Praxiteles have been? And it is the same way with letters. We have produced nothing that can compare in finish and perfection with the works of Æschylus and Sophocles and Plato.

How did this system of government work among the Greeks? They did not have these baffling questions that we have had thrust upon us in our complicated material civilization, and yet no man could be long prominent in public life before he would encounter antagonism, and unless he bowed to it he would be stricken down. As great an orator and as pure a patriot as ever lived, Demosthenes, was put to death because in spite of the clamor of his countrymen he had insisted on regarding the real interests of his country.

I say we do not want even a political recall. But I am talking too much about the political recall, because I wish to speak especially upon the recall of judges. Our system of government permits political liberty, and at the same time it has another great object. It aims to safeguard individual rights and individual freedom. There is a distinction between the agencies of our Government which deal with the political expressions of our people and those agencies which administer justice between man and man. It is the very essence of democracy that any man, however humble and lowly and poor he may be, may have his rights under the Constitution and the laws as against the most powerful in the land; and so we attempted to set our judges aside and to free them from the influence of popular passion, so that they might exactly and equally enforce the law. But we must make them of human clay. We can not have archangels for our judges, but we attempt to make them as independent and impartial as the lot of humanity will permit.

Now, suppose you make them dependent for every decision which they may make upon the will of the people and liable to be called upon to argue any of their legal decisions upon appeal before a popular tribunal.

Why, a man may no sooner be upon the bench in Arizona—I believe he may be there six months—when one-fourth of the voters may petition for his recall, and then he is given the inestimable privilege of choosing between two alternatives—either to resign in five days or to make his defense in 200 words and have the people pass upon his record. What sort of a judge would you have under that system—a judge who would feel that after any decision, if he might offend powerful interests, if he might offend some great politician, if he might offend some great corporation employing thousands of men, or some great labor union which might hold the balance of power, he would be subject to recall? What sort of justice would you have under such a system? Why, your judge, instead of going to the sources of the law and to the fountains of jurisprudence before deciding a case, would go out and look at the weather vane. He might be put on trial before the very mob from whose lawless vengeance he had just rescued a prisoner.

But you say these things can not affect a judge. Why, there is nothing in the character of the office, if you make the man's tenancy of it dependent upon the popular favor of the moment, that would change the nature of the man.

Before the Revolution of 1688 in England the judges held their office at the pleasure of the Crown, and under the last of the Stuart kings we had an era of the grossest judicial crimes, we had an era of the blackest judicial murders which history records. The will of the sovereign was subserved by the judges; and the great result of that portentious revolution was to take away from the King the power over the tenure of judges and establish their independence. Ever since that time the administration of justice in England has been surpassed nowhere upon the face of the globe.

Adopt this system and you will have your judges respond in the same way as they responded when the King was their master. You will have them inevitably respond to the political boss, or to the man who controls the political party, or to popular clamor, precisely as Representatives are too often apt to respond to them.

We have had in Massachusetts ever since our constitution was adopted a judicial tenure during good behavior, commonly known as the life tenure, and I do not believe that any judicial system in the world has been administered with a greater regard for the interests of the people, or has better served the ends of justice, than has ours in Massachusetts.

In 1853, when there was a wave going over the country for the election of judges, an attempt was made to change our constitution. Of course, our judges could not make uniformly popular decisions. There were decisions under the fugitive-slave acts, where the supreme court of Massachusetts and the circuit court of the United States in Massachusetts had ordered the return of black men to bondage under the clause of the Federal Constitution which gave the master the right to reclaim his slave. Those decisions were disliked by a great many people, and the judges were criticized on account of them. Richard H. Dana, who was one of our greatest lawyers, and who was a most eloquent advocate of the rights of these black men, having defended some of them, said upon that point that he was deeply grieved at these decisions; but he declared that in his greatest distress there was one drop of comfort left him:

I knew that these decisions came from men who were not making them for their judicial lives. I knew that they came from men who were not making them because their offices or their salaries were dependent upon them.

[Applause.]

At the time of that convention to amend the constitution a speech was made which probably was more responsible than anything else for the fact that the constitution of Massachusetts was not amended.

That speech was made by Rufus Choate, as brilliant an advocate as ever spoke the English tongue. Far better than any words of mine what he said at that time will illumine this debate, and I will read some extracts from that speech which I think are very pertinent to this discussion. Speaking of the character of the office of a judge, he says:

Dismissing for a moment all theories about the mode of appointing him or the time for which he shall hold office, sure I am we all demand that as far as human virtue, assisted by the best contrivances of human wisdom, can attain to it he shall not respect persons in judgment. He shall know nothing about the parties; everything about the case. He shall do everything for justice; nothing for himself; nothing for his friend; nothing for his patron; nothing for his sovereign. If on one side is the executive power and the legislature and the people—the sources of his honors, the givers of his daily bread—and on the other an individual nameless and odious, his eye is to see neither, great nor small, attending only to the "trepidations of the balance." If a law is passed by a unanimous legislature, clamored for by the general voice of the public, and a cause is before him on it, in which the whole community is on one side and an individual nameless or odious on the other, and he believes it to be against the Constitution, he must so declare it, or there is no judge.

I would have him one who might look back from the venerable last years of Mansfield or Marshall and recall such testimonies as these to the great and good judge:

"The young men saw me, and hid themselves; and the aged arose and stood up.

"The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand upon their mouth.

"When the ear heard me, then it blessed me, and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me.

"Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.

"The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.

"I put on righteousness and it clothed me. My judgment was as a robe and a diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.

"I was a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not, I searched out.

"And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth."

Give to the community such a judge, and I care little who makes the rest of the Constitution, or what party administers it. It will be a free government, I know.

He speaks thus of the qualities of a judge:

In the first place, the qualities which fit him for the office are quite peculiar; less palpable, less salient, so to speak, less easily and accurately appreciated by cursory and general notice. They are an uncommon, recondite, and difficult learning, and they are a certain power and turn of mind and cast of character which, until they come actually and for a considerable length of time and in many varieties of circumstances, to be displayed upon the bench itself, may be almost unremarked but by near and professional observers.

The candidate is made the nominee of a party boss—

And so nominated, the candidate is put through a violent election, abused by the press; abused on the stump, charged 10,000 times over with being very little of a lawyer and a good deal of a knave or boor; and after being tossed on this kind of a blanket for some uneasy months is chosen by a majority of 10 votes out of 100,000, and comes into court breathless, terrified, with perspiration in drops on his brow, wondering how he ever got there, to take his seat on the bench. And in the very first cause he tries he sees on one side the counsel who procured his nomination in caucus and has defended him by pen and tongue before the people, and on the other the most prominent of his assailants, one who has been denying his talents, denying his learning, denying his integrity, denying him every judicial quality and every quality that may define a good man before half the counties in the State. Is not this about as infallible a recipe as you could wish to make a judge a respecter of persons? Will it not inevitably load him with the suspicion of partiality, whether he deserves it or not?

The argument was urged that a judge should be elected as well as a governor or members of the legislature, and to this Mr. Choate replied as follows:

It seems to me that such an argument forgets that our political system, while it is purely and intensely republican, within all theories, aims to accomplish a twofold object, to wit, liberty and security. To accomplish this twofold object we have established a twofold set of institutions and instrumentalities—some of them designed to develop and give utterance to one; some of them designed to provide permanently and constantly for the other; some of them designed to bring out the popular will in its utmost intensity of utterance; some of them designed to secure life, and liberty, and character, and happiness, and property, and equal and exact justice against all will and against all power. These institutions and instrumentalities in their immediate mechanism and workings are as distinct and diverse, one from the other, as they are in their offices and in their ends. But each one is the more perfect for the separation, and the aggregate result is our own Massachusetts.

Thus, in the law-making department, and in the whole department of elections to office of those who make and those who execute the law, you give the utmost assistance to the expression of liberty. You give the choice to the people. You make it an annual choice; you give it to the majority; you make, moreover, a free press; you privilege debate; you give freedom to worship God according only to the dictates of the individual conscience.

But to the end that one man, that the majority, may not deprive any of life, liberty, property, the opportunity of seeking happiness, there are institutions of security. There is a Constitution to control the Government; there is a separation of departments of Government; there is a judiciary to interpret and administer the laws, "that every man may find his security therein." And in constituting these provisions for security you may have regard mainly to the specific and separate objects which they have in view.

* * * * * * *

Your security is greater; your liberty is not less. You assign to liberty her place, her stage, her emotions, her ceremonies; you assign to law and justice theirs. The stage, the emotions, the visible presence of liberty are in the mass meeting; the procession by torchlight; at the polls; in the halls of legislation; in the voices of the press; in the freedom of political speech; in the energy, intelligence, and hope which pervade the mass; in the silent unreturning tide of progression. But there is another apartment, smaller, humbler, more quiet, down in the basement story of our Capitol—appropriated to justice, to security, to reason, to restraint; where there is no respect of persons; where there is no high nor low, nor strong nor weak; where will is nothing, and power is nothing, and numbers are nothing—and all are equal and all secure before the law. Is it a sound objection to your system that in that apartment you do not find the symbols, the cap, the flag of freedom? Is it any objection to a courtroom that you can not hold a mass meeting in it while a trial is proceeding? Is liberty abridged because the procession returning by torchlight from celebrating anticipated or actual party victory can not pull down a half dozen houses of the opposition with impunity, and because its leaders awake from intoxications of her Saturnalia to find themselves in jail for a riot? Is it any objection that every object of the political system is not equally provided for in every part of it? No, sir. "Everything in its place, and a place for everything." If the result is an aggregate of social and political perfection, absolute security combined with as much liberty as you can live in, that is the state for you. Thank God for that; let the flag wave over it; die for it.

Then he concluded by this reference to the people of Massachusetts, which will apply in effect to the people of the whole country:

Sir, that people have two traits of character, just as our political system in which that character is shown forth has two great ends. They love liberty; that is one trait. They love it and they possess it to their heart's content. Free as storms to-day do they not know it and feel it—every one of them, from the sea to the Green Mountains. But there is another side of their character, and that is the old Anglo-Saxon instinct of property—the rational and the creditable desire to be secure in life, in reputation, in the earnings of daily labor, in the little all which makes up the treasures and the dear charities of the humblest home; the desire to feel certain when they come to die that the last will shall be kept, the smallest legacy of affection shall reach its object, although the giver is in his grave; this desire and the sound sense to know that a learned, impartial, and honored judiciary is the only means of having it indulged. They have nothing timorous in them as touching the largest liberty. They rather like the exhilaration of crowding sail on the noble old ship and giving her to scud away before a 14-knot breeze; but they know, too, that if the storm comes on to blow, and the masts go overboard, and the gun deck is rolled under water, and the lee shore, edged with foam, thunders under her stern, that the sheet anchor and best bower then are everything! Give them good ground tackle and they will carry her round the world and back again till there shall be no more sea.

[Applause.]

During the foregoing remarks the time of the gentleman expired and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] yielded him one minute additional time.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken such a wide range that I wish, in the short time that I am to occupy the floor, to discuss the various propositions that will come before the committee, to be voted on at 3 o'clock, namely, the resolution submitted by the Committee on the Territories admitting as States the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico and the substitutes offered by the two wings of the minority of that committee.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins his speech I desire to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON. I notice that in the amendment providing for New Mexico there is a different provision regarding the ballot from the provision in regard to the amendment to the Arizona constitution.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; I understand.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have in my hand a newspaper clipping sent me by a member of the constitutional convention of New Mexico complaining of the difference. Will the gentleman please state to the committee why this difference and which amendment follows the law of either State, if there is any difference, and if the New Mexico amendment does not follow the ballot law of New Mexico, then why?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the difference was made in the resolution because the Arizona election laws are of the most modern character; the secret ballot and all the Australian ballot provisions are embraced in it. In New Mexico such is not the case, and we desire to give the people of New Mexico who vote on this amendment an opportunity to have an election under such restrictions, so that it may be absolutely fair and honest. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the Territories have had but one desire in the work they have done in this matter and the resolution they have reported, and that is to bring about the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States of this Union with as little delay as possible. [Applause.] I believe that the committee has adopted a course that will bring those two States into this Union, and the only course that will bring them in without serious delay. To fully understand the situation it is necessary for us to consider for a few moments the immediate history connected with the effort to get these two Territories in as States. On June 20, 1910, the President approved the enabling act to permit the people of New Mexico and Arizona to adopt constitutions and become States. By the terms of the enabling act we provided for the election of delegates to constitutional conventions and empowered them to frame constitutions for their respective proposed States. We provided also for the ratification or rejection of these constitutions.

On the 21st day of January of this year a vote was taken upon the constitution of New Mexico, as framed by the constitutional convention provided for in the enabling act, and this constitution was ratified by a large majority of the votes cast upon it.

On the 9th day of February of this year a vote was taken upon the constitution framed by the constitutional convention of Arizona, as provided for in the enabling act, and that constitution was ratified by a vote of about 80 per cent of the vote cast.

No other question was voted on, nor was any other election held but a vote upon the ratification or rejection of these constitutions. This was as the enabling act provided.

The enabling act further provided that if the constitutions so framed should be republican in form, not in conflict with the Declaration of Independence, and should conform to the terms of the enabling act, that they should be submitted to Congress and the President; and if Congress and the President both approved the constitutions, then, upon notice by the President to the governors of the Territories, elections should soon thereafter be held for State and county officers, members of the legislatures, and representatives in Congress. If, however, the President approved these constitutions and Congress did not approve them, then the final steps for the admission of these States were not to be taken until after the adjournment of the next regular session of Congress. Of course, if Congress disapproved the constitutions the Territories would not be admitted as States.

On the 24th day of last February the President transmitted a message to Congress approving the constitution of New Mexico. He has not up to this time taken any action in reference to the constitution of Arizona. Upon the receipt of the message of the President approving the constitution of New Mexico it was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

On the 28th day of February the committee reported and there was passed by this House a resolution approving the constitution of that proposed State. The committee had hearings, Mr. Chairman, but I do not believe if that committee had heard the arguments and evidence that the committee of this Congress heard upon this question that that report would have been anything like unanimous. I doubt if they could have gotten a majority of that committee to approve the constitution of New Mexico at all. The first day of this session of Congress I introduced a resolution to approve both the constitution of New Mexico and Arizona. I did that with the information I then had. If I had had the information at that time that I now possess, I should have introduced just such a resolution as the Committee on the Territories has reported here for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole. [Applause.] We have made changes, or suggested them; we have proposed changes in both of these constitutions, and so have the minority of this committee proposed changes in the Arizona constitution.

We proposed in the case of New Mexico that there should be submitted to the people of that proposed State an article on amendments as a substitute for the article on amendments which their constitutional convention put in that constitution, and the minority of the committee objects to that. We proposed, Mr. Chairman, an amendment which provides that a majority of both houses of the legislature may submit amendments, that the number of amendments to be submitted shall be in the discretion of the legislature, and that a majority of the people voting upon the amendments can adopt them. The minority opposes that proposition and says that New Mexico ought to come in with no suggestion made as to the change of its constitution, and they give two reasons for their position. The first is that by proposing this change we will delay the admission of New Mexico as a State, and the second is that the constitution of New Mexico as adopted is already easy of amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no foundation in fact for either position taken by the minority of the Committee on Territories and the gentlemen who have supported that minority here. [Applause.] The enabling act provides that when the final steps looking to the admission of this Territory are taken, when this resolution passes, or the original resolution, as I introduced it, or any other resolution of admission passes, the President shall notify the governor of New Mexico, who shall order an election, and when that election has taken place the fact is certified to the President, then the President issues his proclamation which makes New Mexico a State. Now, we have proposed——

Mr. FERRIS. Would it disturb the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Just a question would not.

Mr. FERRIS. I am very much interested in the gentleman's remarks, and I think the committee has advocated the only avenue for good statehood for Arizona. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not his opinion that the two minority reports—following either one—will eventually deny Arizona any kind of statehood at all, with the views of the President as they are?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. FERRIS. One question further. I notice the Delegate from Arizona has signed one of the minority reports.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I notice that, too. I was astonished at it. I can not see how a man who is here representing the Territory of Arizona, whose people are anxious for statehood, could sign a report and advocate a resolution the purpose of which is to deny to those people statehood. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will.

Mr. CAMERON. I think I fully set forth, Mr. Chairman, my position in my remarks to this House, and I am willing to stand by what I said on the floor of this House. My explanation will be in print to-morrow and you can all read it. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will not be able to protect himself from the wrath of the people of Arizona by the excuse he gave here Saturday, because he admitted he knew nothing of what the position of the President of the United States was, and therefore the people of Arizona will not be fooled by his statement that he signed the report to please the President. With this admission went the only defense he had for his position. [Applause.]

Now, we propose that the amendment we are going to submit shall be voted on at the election at which these officers are to be elected, which election must take place under the enabling act before the President can declare New Mexico a State. So there can not be an hour's or a minute's delay on account of this proposition. Therefore the statement made by the minority of this committee that it would cause delay in the admission of New Mexico is absolutely without foundation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The other objection urged by the minority of the committee to this resolution is that it is not necessary, because the constitution of New Mexico already provides an easy method of amendment. So carried away are these gentlemen by their zeal to serve their partisan friends in that Territory that they have actually made that statement in the report filed in the House.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] made the same statement this morning. He made it upon the authority of my colleague upon the committee, Mr. WILLIS, of Ohio. I assert, Mr. Chairman, that it is a more difficult constitution to amend than any constitution that exists in the United States to-day. There is no State now in the Union that has a constitution anything like as hard to amend as the one proposed for the new State of New Mexico. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], when he discussed this question, asserted with great positiveness that there were only two States in the Union in which a majority of the legislatures could submit amendments and a majority of the people at the polls could ratify those amendments. I told him I knew he was mistaken.

The gentleman had his books and I did not have mine, and could not, therefore, prove my statement at the time. But even his books did not bear him out. I find that the books he had show that the Oregon constitution provides that a majority of both houses of the legislature can submit amendments and a majority of the people at the polls can adopt those amendments, and that is one of the States that the gentleman did not include in the two he named. I found that in the State of Michigan—and I called his especial attention to Michigan—they have a provision much easier even in the submission of amendments than by a majority of the legislature. Twenty-five per cent of the qualified voters can submit amendments, and the majority of the people voting on the amendments can ratify them; and when these amendments are considered by the legislature a majority of both houses of the legislature can submit a substitute amendment for the one proposed by the people, and a majority of the people at the polls, voting on those amendments, can adopt them. I simply mention these two States to show that my distinguished friend was wrong in his statement of facts. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that he is as wrong in his statement of every other fact connected with the statehood matter as he is in connection with this fact. My friend is eloquent and entertaining, but he does not recognize a fact.

Mr. WILLIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply wanted to inquire what the gentleman said about the constitution of Oregon. I did not catch quite all of his statement.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The constitution of Oregon—not the antiquated one, probably, that the gentleman has, but the one that is now in force—provides that:

> Amendment or amendments may be proposed in either branch of the legislative assembly, and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to each of the two houses such proposed amendment or amendments shall, with the yeas and nays thereon, be entered in their journals and referred by the secretary of state to the people for their approval or rejection at the next general election, except when the legislative assembly shall order a special election for that purpose. If a majority of the electors voting on any such amendment shall vote in favor thereof, it shall thereby become a part of this constitution.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to be perfectly frank and fair with my friend, and I will say to him that in volume 5 of the book to which I referred—"Charters and Constitutions," printed at the Government Printing Office in 1909—there is the distinct statement that the amendment has to be referred to a second session of the legislature.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is the old constitution. The gentleman is like all Republicans; he can not keep up with the march of the times and the march of progress, and even the adoption of progressive constitutions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The New Mexico constitution is a most difficult one to amend. It requires two-thirds of each house of the legislature to submit an amendment, except at intervals of eight years, and amendments can only be submitted at general elections. Any amendment submitted must be ratified by a majority of the votes cast on the amendment, and in addition to this by 40 per cent of the votes cast at the election and in at least 50 per cent of the counties.

To require two-thirds of each house of the legislature to submit an amendment on its face does not seem to be a very rigid restriction on the power of amendment; but we find that there are 26 counties in New Mexico and that these 26 counties have 24 senators. To submit an amendment it will take the vote of 16 senators. By reference to the apportionment for senators it will be seen that 4 of these 26 counties control the election of more than enough senators, if they are opposed to the submission of an amendment, to prevent one being submitted to the people. The county of Socorro, with a population of 14,760—about 1,200 more population than would entitle it to one senator—not only is given a senator, but is made a part of two other senatorial districts, and if the vote of Socorro is properly organized it could control three votes in the senate against the submission of an amendment. Bernalillo County has its own senator and is projected into another senatorial district, so it can be made to control two senators. San Miguel County is so apportioned that it may control three senators, and Colfax County, a mining county, where the voters are notoriously under the control of the mine owners, with a population of a few thousand more than is necessary to entitle it to a senator, is made to constitute not only one senatorial district, but a part of a second. It will be seen, therefore, that these four counties, with an aggregate population of 77,000, or about 23 per cent of the population of the State, can control 10 of the senators out of 24, or more than 40 per cent of the senate. Or, to substitute Rio Arriba for Bernalillo—and Rio Arriba controls two senators—there would be a population of about 70,000, or a little more than 21 per cent of the entire population of the State, controlling 10 senators, and would be able to prevent the submission of an amendment.

This demonstrates the difficulty which will confront the people of New Mexico in taking the first step toward securing an amendment to their constitution. The constitution provides that this apportionment shall not be changed by the legislature until after the publication of the census of 1920, and then does not require that an apportionment be made, but merely permits the legislature to make one. This also demonstrates the inequality in the representation in the State senate and, to a certain extent, the same inequality exists in the apportionment for the House. The evidence before the committee was to the effect that certain counties in New Mexico, none of which are in the list of these five, are rapidly increasing in population and are filling up with American citizens from Texas, Oklahoma, and other States, which will each year make the inequality of this apportionment greater.

Taking this apportionment in connection with the two-thirds of each house required to submit amendments to the people, it is too rigid a restriction on the power of amendment. I have heard a good deal said about this apportionment being gotten up in the interest of the Republican Party. I was not so impressed with that fact as I was with the fact that it was gotten up in the interests of the corporations of New Mexico. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republicans were, of course, incidentally helped. [Applause.] The strongest proponents of this constitution who appeared before our committee admitted that this was a corporation-ridden Territory and that its constitutional convention was controlled by corporate interests. At least there was no denial of that fact. And they have taken the counties that are absolutely corporation ridden and projected them into senatorial districts over nearly all of the State for the purpose of preventing any amendment to this corporation-written constitution that they are trying to impose upon the people of New Mexico. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The rights of the people of no State in this Union have been so bartered away by fundamental law as is proposed in this constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the people of New Mexico ask to be relieved from this provision, which puts them in the power of the corporate interests of that Territory. Cedric the Saxon never had a stronger hold upon the services of Gurth, the swineherd, than have the corporations of New Mexico upon the votes of the majority of the people of these five counties. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, from this you can see the difficulty that the people will encounter in procuring the submission of an amendment.

But that is not the greatest difficulty they will have. That will come when they have an amendment voted on by the people. Of course, it must get a majority of the votes polled for the amendment. Then it must get 40 per cent of all the votes polled in the whole State at a general election. So, of the people who go to the election, interested in the election of county and State officers and Members of Congress, those who do not vote on the amendment at all will be counted against the amendment.

But that is not all. They could even stand that, Mr. Chairman, but there is another provision, and I defy any man upon this floor to point to a single State in this Union that has a provision anything like approaching the one I am going to mention now. It is this: Not only must they get a majority of all the votes polled on the amendment, not only must that be 40 per cent of all the votes polled in the State, but it must be 40 per cent of the votes polled in at least 50 per cent of the counties.

There are something over 60,000 voters in this Territory now. Nearly that many have been polled in elections between contending candidates. I have made a calculation, and I find that if the constitution had been submitted at a general election and a full vote polled, and if this provision had been applied, there were 11 of these counties which did not cast votes enough for the constitution to constitute 40 per cent of the full vote that in all probability would have been cast. And if there had been a change of about 250 votes in three other counties, under a provision like this, the constitution itself would not have been adopted at the election in January, notwithstanding the great desire of the New Mexican people to become a State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The corporations have the people of this Territory by the throat; and under this constitution which they have forced upon them, with its unfair apportionment, they will, unless we give the relief provided in this resolution, rally its mercenaries in the counties where they are strong behind the ramparts of countless moneybags and hold the State indefinitely against the will of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. For a question; my time is short.

Mr. FERRIS. Along the line of the gentleman's argument, and in support of it, I want to call his attention to a question submitted in our State, showing that the people vote for the head of a ticket and much less for a proposition away down the line. In our State the Torrens land system was submitted, and while there was a vote of between 250,000 and 260,000 for governor on the Torrens land-system proposition, which was a proposition other than the head of the ticket, they cast only 198,282 votes, over 50,000 less than for the head of the ticket.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. That is the case everywhere. Gentlemen representing every shade of political thought in New Mexico appeared before us, asking to be relieved of this infamous and binding article upon amendments. There were representatives of the Democratic Party, four gentlemen appointed by the Democratic executive committee of this Territory, who appeared and made this request. There was a representative of progressive Republicans in New Mexico preferring a similar request. A representative of the Anti-Saloon League appeared and made a similar request. A representative of the Women's Christian Temperance Union appeared and made a similar request. The only organization that did not make this request was that of the stand-pat Republicans of New Mexico, who seem to be hand in glove with and controlled and owned by the corporations of that Territory. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They ask us, Mr. Chairman, to relieve them of the tyranny and oppression of the corporations that had robbed their people and their Territory. They gave us every reason to believe that if we would give the people an opportunity to vote for a substitute for the article on amendments that that substitute would be adopted, and in the future we could expect to see this new State controlled by its people, instead of by the bosses and corporations that have in the past plundered and exploited them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The proposed constitution attempts to secure the original Mexican or Spanish-American population of New Mexico in their equal right of suffrage and in the enjoyment of equal rights of education with other citizens, present and prospective, of the new State. Your committee has not only, by its proposed amendment of said article 19, preserved such rights as are secured in the proposed constitution, but has made sections 1 and 3 of article 7, on the elective franchise, and sections 8 and 10 of article 12, on education, more difficult of amendment than is provided in said proposed constitution, to the end that the Spanish-American population of said Territory shall be made secure for the future in the enjoyment of equal rights of suffrage and equal rights of education.

It will be noted that the amendment suggested in the substitute reported is not made mandatory, but is to be submitted to the electors for ratification or rejection, as a majority may determine, thus putting the whole matter under control of the people of the new State and so providing that they can consider and vote again on that particular article of their constitution; and no reason, except one of partisanship, can be advanced why they should not have this right. [Applause.]

It has been represented to your committee, and is no doubt true, that the people of the Territory were so very desirous of securing statehood that when the proposed constitution was submitted its merits and demerits were not carefully considered; but being submitted to them as it was, as a whole, a large majority, through their great desire to secure statehood, voted for it without regard to what its provisions were. The amendment suggested by the substitute resolution reported by this committee will give them the power and opportunity which they otherwise would not have to change any provision which, in their desire for statehood, may not have been sufficiently considered when the proposed constitution was ratified. [Applause.]

SEPARATE BALLOT.

It will be seen from section 4 of the substitute resolution that provision is made for a separate ballot for the purpose of voting upon such amendment, which is to be printed on paper of a blue tint, so as to be readily distinguishable from the white ballots, which will be used for the election of officers at the same election, and that these ballots are to be delivered only to the election officers authorized to have custody of the ballot boxes and to be delivered by them to the individual voter when he offers to vote.

The provisions in reference to this separate ballot were provided because the election is in other respects to be held under and subject to the election laws of New Mexico now in force, which do not provide for a secret ballot and under which ballots are required to be "printed on plain white paper 3 inches in width and 8 inches in length or within one-quarter of an inch of that size." And said ballots are to have the names of all candidates for the respective offices printed thereon, and if the suggested amendments were required also to be printed on these ballots it is obvious that there would scarcely be room for that purpose, and, in fact, as the amendments are to be printed in two languages, it would be impracticable, if not impossible, to print them on ballots of that size, and, besides, under the present election laws of the Territory, the ballots can be distributed indiscriminately among the people sometime before the day of election, and, in other respects, these election laws are lacking in the usual safeguards while the provisions provided for by the substitute resolution of the committee in reference to the separate constitutional ballot will guarantee the necessary and usual safeguards. [Applause.]

BOUNDARY LINE.

The substitute resolution provides, as did the original resolution, for an amendment in reference to the boundary line between New Mexico and the State of Texas.

This provision was incorporated in the joint resolution so that there might be no mistake as to this boundary line. In the past there has been a disagreement on this subject.

Some years ago a survey was made, known as the Clarke survey, to settle this dispute. Legislation has been had in Congress and in the Legislature of Texas confirming the Clarke survey. The New Mexico constitution disregarded the Clarke survey, and when this was learned a joint resolution was passed by Congress and approved on February 16, 1911, by the President, declaring the line established by the Clarke survey to be the proper boundary line between New Mexico and Texas; now to prevent any question being raised as to whether this joint resolution admitting New Mexico as a State with a constitution fixing a boundary line different from the one established by the Clarke survey superseded the joint resolution of February 16, 1911, we have provided that the admission of New Mexico shall be subject to the terms and conditions of that joint resolution.

SPANISH-AMERICAN CITIZENS.

The substitute provides for the repeal of that part of the enabling act which prescribes the qualifications for members of the legislature and officers in the new State to be the ability to read, write, and speak the English language. There never was any just reason for compelling such a provision to be incorporated in the constitution of New Mexico. No such provision has been in the laws enacted for the government of this Territory during the 60 years that it has been a part of this country, or any other of our Territories. It is violative of the conditions upon which the Spanish-American portion of the population of New Mexico became citizens of the United States. These people constitute a most meritorious class of the citizenship of that Territory and are nearly one-half of its population. From the evidence before the committee it is clear that they are a very different class of people from the inhabitants of Mexico. They are descendants of Spaniards who settled this part of the country in 1595, and owed their allegiance directly to Spain. In the twenties they became subject to the Mexican Government, but never had much intercourse with the Mexican people. This allegiance continued for more than 25 years, when this part of the country was ceded to the United States. Under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo they were guaranteed "all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution." By the Gadsden treaty the same provision was made. It was also contained in the organic act establishing the government of New Mexico. The people are largely agricultural and pastoral; they are honest, industrious, hospitable, frugal, and patriotic. There can be no better class of citizens for rural communities than they are described to be. English is being taught in all of the schools of the Territory now and the population largely speaks English, but some of the most highly respected and most intelligent citizens of that Territory do not understand it sufficiently well to enable them to qualify for membership in the legislature or to hold any other office under this enabling act and constitution. The people of the Territory who are of Spanish descent naturally feel that this is an unjust discrimination against them and a breach of faith on the part of Congress. They feel that they took possession of this country, that they carved a civilized State out of the wilderness, that they wrested it from the Indians and consecrated it forever as the theater of the transcendent achievement of the Spanish-speaking people upon the American Continent. They are desirous that this restriction should be removed, and with this desire I fully sympathize. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ARIZONA.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about Arizona. We recommend that New Mexico be admitted, we believe its constitution is republican in form. We had some doubt about it at first, but we solved that doubt in favor of the constitution. We believe that the constitution of Arizona is republican in form, and we believe that the arguments made here denouncing it springs from partisan motives and a deep-laid and skillfully planned effort to keep this brave and glorious Democratic State out of the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; I have not time. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAFFERTY. It is only for a suggestion.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I do not need any aid, and I think I can make my own speech. I do not mean to be discourteous to the gentleman, but my time is very limited.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the minority of the committee say that Arizona's constitution, because of the recall of judicial officers in it, is fundamentally destructive of a republican form of government. It is curious, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen will take the position that a constitution having the initiative in it, the referendum in it, and the recall of all the officers is not unrepublican on account of those provisions, but that the recall of judges makes it antirepublican.

I see my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], who made an able argument along this line last week. I read the newspaper after going home, from the delight I experienced at hearing his speech, and found that the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania came very near mobbing the speaker because he refused to allow them to vote on a constitutional amendment to submit to the people whether there should be an initiative in Pennsylvania. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Instead of trying to keep Arizona out of the Union because she wishes to recall her judicial officers when they are corrupt or when they are not true to their duties, my friend had better go back home and try to keep the legislature and electorate of the old State of Pennsylvania straight.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman will yield, I did not object to Arizona's constitution on account of the initiative and referendum, but simply on account of the recall.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; on account of a much less republican provision. If the gentleman had objected to it on account of the initiative, I would have thought possibly there was some consistency in his position, but he objected to it as not being republican on account of a much less republican provision, that of the recall of the judges. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The substitute proposes to the people of that Territory an amendment by which they can vote upon the article on the recall of public officials, so that it will not apply to judicial officers. Whether the recall of public officials is wise or unwise is a matter which was not considered by the committee, as we did not feel that it was in our province to determine this question. I am satisfied and the committee was satisfied, however, that the article on recall of public officials does not render the constitution unrepublican in form.

While these were our views, we did feel that the same desire existing in that Territory for statehood that existed in New Mexico might have induced the people to vote for this provision of their constitution, which has been so savagely attacked, through their desire to obtain statehood and not because they favored it. We therefore thought it just to them and wise to give them an opportunity to vote upon this provision again, and also wished to make this substitute in reference to Arizona meet as near as we could the views of the President of the United States as we understood them. The minority, including the Delegate from Arizona, who have been so desirous that nothing should be done to delay the admission of New Mexico, seem equally anxious to prevent the admission of Arizona as a State. These gentlemen have recommended a resolution which will deny statehood to the people of Arizona, unless they surrender their manhood and their principles and vote as those gentlemen dictate. They propose that Arizona shall not only vote upon an amendment to her constitution, but that her people shall vote as they tell them to vote, and unless they do this they will be denied the right of statehood.

They are not willing to trust the people who bear the burdens of government; they declaim with great eloquence against giving the people too much power, forgetting that in a republic the people are the source of all power.

Their anxiety is misplaced. There is no danger that the people will destroy this Government. It is of the people, and they are determined that it shall not perish from the face of the earth, and, in turn, the Government will protect its citizens. It will take trusts and monopolies by the throat; it will equalize the burdens of taxation. It can distribute its privileges impartially, and, Mr. Chairman, it can do more—it can trust the people, in whose name it was founded, in whose courage it was defended, in whose wisdom it has been administered, and in whose stricken love and confidence it can not survive. [Applause.]

No attack is made upon the constitution on account of the initiative and referendum or the recall as applied to any other officers than judges. I can see no reason why the republican form of this constitution is affected by the recall of the judiciary more than it is by the recall provision as applied to the executive or other officers. If the one makes it unrepublican, then the other would also. Having conceded that the constitution with the recall of executive officers is republican in form, it is difficult to understand what argument can be advanced to demonstrate why the application of this principle to the judiciary would make a constitution antirepublican, and no reason why the one class of officers can be differentiated from the other has been given in this debate. [Applause.]

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I yield to no man in the respect I entertain for the judiciary. I come from a State which has given the greatest judges who have adorned the bench of this country and where the people not only respect, but revere, the judges. I have too much respect for both the people and the judges to believe that the power of recall in the people will affect the integrity, the ability, or the fearlessness of those who occupy judicial positions.

The question for us to decide is whether the recall is antirepublican. Reverting to the Federal Constitution, we find that while section 4 of Article IV was under discussion in the constitutional convention Gov. Randolph, of Virginia, offered a resolution, which was amended by Mr. Madison, and reads as follows:

> The republican constitutions and the existing laws of each State to be guaranteed by the United States.

Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, offered an amendment to this which was adopted and which we find in the Constitution, as follows:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

While this resolution was being discussed Gov. Randolph made the following statement:

> The republican government must be the basis of our National Union, and no State in it ought to have the power to change its government into a monarchy. (1 Elliott's Debates, 453.)

Immediately after this statement by the author of the resolution, it was unanimously agreed to. Here is a clear-cut statement of the purpose of the guaranty. It guaranteed against the rule of the few and not against the exercise of power by the people.

In the Federalist Mr. Madison defines a republic to be:

> A government which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior.

Under this definition the recall is properly a part of a republican form of government, because it is provided that the officers shall hold during pleasure, which means the pleasure of the people.

Mr. Wilson, who helped to frame this provision, afterwards became a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in the case of Chisolm v. Georgia (2 Dallas, 457), gives the definition of a republican government to be one where "the supreme power resides in the body of the people."

The discussion of this question in the Federalist, in the textbooks, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, leads to the conclusion that the phrase "republican form of government" was used in the Constitution as contradistinguished from a government in which the few are the ruling power—a monarchy, an aristocracy, or oligarchy. It follows, then, that had the Federal Government provided for more power in the people, it would have been republican, and it also follows that if there had been a provision that the officers of the government could be recalled at the will of the people, it would still be republican in form.

If, as stated by Madison in the Federalist, a republican government is one administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, then the fact that the people have a right to recall their officers certainly can not be antirepublican.

The recall system is but another method by which officers of a State or its subdivisions may be removed from their offices. The power to remove officers is generally vested in the legislative department or in some other department of the State government, either by the direct power of impeachment or removal. There can exist no constitutional reason why this power should not be reserved to or vested in the people.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is there any better way that you can conceive of to find out what is the pleasure of the people than by the exercise of the thing called the recall?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Well, I do not know that there are not other ways just as good.

Mr. GRAHAM. But the gentleman knows of no other?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Well, I think that when people in mass meetings instruct their representatives, or when their representatives are in constant correspondence with their constituents, they can form a very good idea of what the people do want. I do not mean to commit myself to the recall. I think it is free of many of the objections that have been urged against it, and that these denunciations made of it on this floor are unjustifiable, but I hold they have nothing to do with the question which we are considering, because I do not believe that any gentleman upon this floor will contend that having a provision for the recall of any public official in a constitution renders that constitution antirepublican. No one here has as yet been bold enough or courageous enough to come out and say that this recall provision of the judiciary renders this constitution unrepublican in form; and if it does not, it seems to me that we have but one duty to perform, and that duty is to vote to admit the Territory of Arizona as a State as soon as possible. [Applause.]

I recognize the high and important part the judiciary plays in our system of government, and I would not aid any movement which I thought would weaken the proper powers of that important branch of our Government, but I fail to see the great dangers in this recall provision that some have professed to fear. I do not believe the people who possessed this power would undermine either the independence or the integrity of their judiciary.

In my State, which is exceedingly conservative, there is a provision by which judges can be removed by a joint resolution of the two houses of the general assembly upon 20 days' notice. In every aspect of the case this power of removal in the legislature is as destructive of the independence and integrity of the judiciary as would be the recall vested in the people, because if popular clamor was aroused against the judges it would find expression in the legislature as quickly as it would at the polls; but we have never found that it interfered in the slightest with the character of our judges or the administration of justice.

Virginia is the home of great judges, and her bench is adorned to-day by a set of judges who in ability, in character, in learning, and in independence are the equals of the great judges of the past, of and from Virginia, who added so splendidly to the glory of the judicial history of their State and country. [Applause.]

The fact that the legislature that elected them had power to recall them has never affected the standing or the conduct of our judges. And, Mr. Chairman, there are 12 other States that have a provision for removing judges similar to that of Virginia. Congress is not called upon in this matter to pass upon the wisdom, advisability, or beneficial results of this provision. It may be productive of all the evil results which its most ardent opponents have urged; our individual opinions may be that it is unwise and pernicious in its operation. On the other hand, it may be the wisest provision ever incorporated in the fundamental law of a State; but these are not the questions which we are now considering or which Congress is called on to pass upon. The sole question is whether or not the provision is antirepublican and renders the government of a State in whose constitution it is embodied unrepublican in form.

To hold that a government embodying the recall of judges is not republican in form is to say to the people of Oregon that they have violated the Constitution of the United States; that their government is such as they have no right to maintain; that their Senators and Representatives shall not be admitted to seats in Congress, and that Congress has heretofore erred in so doing. It would be to say to the people of California and of other States that they have not the right or power under the United States Constitution to exercise the powers of recall over their judges, and if they do so we will relegate them to a Territorial form of government.

We may not individually believe that this provision is wise or that it is best for the interest of the people that it should be exercised by them, but I do not believe a dozen men here would go so far as to say to them that they have not the constitutional right to exercise it if they so desire.

It seems to me that no other conclusion can be reached than that this provision is not antirepublican, and that the government of Arizona, under its proposed constitution, is republican in form. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, speaking of Arizona brings to the minds of the older Members in the service here the name of Mark A. Smith. His ability and distinguished service in the cause of his people won the respect of everybody here. His many qualities of heart bound us to him, and I do not think it is saying too much to say that it was due to his intelligent and well-directed efforts that the infamy of uniting these two immense Territories as one State was not finally consummated. [Applause.]

His many appeals on the floor of this House for justice to Arizona still sound in our ears. In all his service he did not burden her with one weight or hindrance. Not a single opportunity to aid or to force her progress did he permit to escape his vigilant and ready action. I am afraid the present Delegate from Arizona can not have as much said for him. I was astonished, Mr. Chairman, when he signed this minority report. I must think that the gentleman was led to deal this blow at his people by his partisan stand-pat Republican associates on that side of the Chamber, who seem, in this instance as in other instances heretofore, willing to put partisanship above the rights of a whole people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, it is discouraging to see gentlemen of such intelligence and of such high character giving away to partisan considerations in great and momentous questions of this kind. In a great and free country like this partisanship can have no secure basis or foundation. In a land which we all love and which we all alike hope and believe will endure, mere party advantage is but temporary and fleeting, but the fruition of the hopes of the people of this Territory will bring lasting and enduring blessings not only to themselves, but to the people of this entire Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am just as desirous of seeing New Mexico admitted into the Union as I am of seeing Arizona admitted. These two Territories have been retarded in their growth and development by reason of not having been granted the right of statehood. It has been difficult to get capital with which to develop their marvelous resources. Development has been stopped. Industrial immigration has been halted. Statehood will remove these disadvantages and these barriers to their progress. They have done everything that a people could do unaided and alone with the governments which they have had.

New Mexico has a population of 327,000, more than double what it was 20 years ago. Arizona has a population of 204,000, nearly treble what it was 20 years ago. New Mexico has taxable values of $300,000,000; Arizona has taxable values of $450,000,000. Each Territory is an empire in extent.

I have often, Mr. Chairman, admired the beautiful and animated fresco that we see as we go up the stairs to the House gallery over there. It represents a caravan traveling to the west in the days when there were no railroads. These people have just reached the highest peak of the Rocky Mountains and they stand in awe and wonder, gazing at the beautiful vision before them, which stretches out to the setting sun. If we can imagine them on the spur of the mountains that separate Arizona from New Mexico, we can see them looking back 300 miles to the Texas line, over New Mexico, and looking forward for an equal distance of 300 miles, over Arizona, to where the Colorado River empties into the Gulf of California—a territory in square miles in each of these proposed States equal to all of New England, New York, and New Jersey combined.

These people have accomplished wonders. They have built cities, towns, and villages. They are cultivating land, operating mines, and running factories. A substantial school system exists in each Territory. Highways are running in every direction. Railroads are being built to all important points, and many irrigation projects of immense size are adding to the productiveness of their acres. All they need is statehood. This will give a splendid impetus to these people, to their development, and to their growth. Population will pour in. The money necessary to develop their resources will be readily secured. And these new States, with constitutions germinating in the hearts of their people and adopted at the polls by the free and untrammeled votes of their citizens, will stride forward to that splendid destiny which we have every reason to believe a kind Providence, aided by the energies of man, has in store for them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LINDBERGH. There is a difference between a government limited as by the Federal Constitution and a people's or popular government run by popular choice. I make that distinction in order that my few statements may not be misunderstood.

The United States is not, within strict interpretation, a people's or popular government, but is a constitutional government. The United States may be said to be governed by the people, except where the Constitution represses. That instrument does limit the majority. It makes no difference that originally the people through their servants framed the Constitution. Those who did that have long since gone and are no longer the people. They left posterity an instrument that limits in several respects the privilege of majority rule.

The only time that this country was in a position to be governed by the people was the period of 12 years between the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the Constitution. Since that time it clearly appears, by interpretation of the courts enforced by judicial decrees, that the people are not entirely in possession nor control of their own Government. In one respect it would require unanimous consent, or practically so, to change the Constitution. For instance, "No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." The State of New York, with nearly 10,000,000 people, has no greater representation in the Senate than the State of Nevada with a population of 81,000; that is, one person in Nevada has a representation in the Senate equal to 123 in New York. Even if all the other States should decide by unanimous vote that each State should have a representation in the Senate in proportion to population, such a decision could be nullified by a majority of the State of Nevada. There would be no way to overcome that except by revolution. There are many cases in which the Constitution prevents the people by majority to rule, the most conspicuous being the manner required to amend the Constitution itself.

The Constitution is a great instrument and has been looked upon as evidence of the profound wisdom of its authors. The good faith and great foresight of its founders is not questioned. It must not be overlooked, however, that the Constitution was a compromise. Some of its provisions were placed there to meet certain emergencies existent at the time of its adoption and not because in themselves they were preferred. In fact, they were, some of them, most strenuously opposed. The Colonies were weak and had to compromise their differences, resulting in some provisions that have later repressed the people.

I have no sympathy with all this talk about the sacredness of old instruments of government, regardless of their fitness for this generation and the future. We can not progress and at the same time follow cumbersome old forms that really block progress. All rules made in the past that are suited, let us keep as long as experience shows them suited to present necessities; but whenever experience shows the need of change, let no fetish reverence for the past methods repress the present and future necessities.

My respect for government rests primarily in the ability of the people to conduct it. Succeeding generations should be better able to master the problems of their own than the people of earlier generations could do it for them. Each generation should conduct the affairs of its own times, and when a majority rules that can be done. So much of the past as is worth while would naturally be adopted. Now, since we have our growth principally in our native born, I do not believe we should be tied up with constitutional limitations that will prevent a majority from changing the Constitution and making such laws and regulations as shall seem best, provided the change is determined by the people.

We can imagine wrongs that a majority could, if it would, do to a minority, but I am not with those who anticipate that the majority will be less just than a minority. We suppose this to be a government by the people, and I am willing to trust it as such. My votes, so far as I am able to cast them, will give the fullest credit to that purpose.

The objection that is pressed the hardest by some to the proposed constitution of Arizona is the provision for the recall of judges. Some have worked up their imaginations to the extent of believing that excitements might and probably would sometime arise and carry in their waves the recall of judges. It is believed by them that the people would go through all the forms required for the recall of judges who had decided cases in accordance with law. Those who carry prejudices of that nature are more considerate of the individual than of the public. Even suppose it happened several times in a century, which is not likely, the fact of the recall would not reverse the cases. They would stand as they had been decided. If the decisions were wrong, the recall would not be wholly unmerited. As things are now, a judge can not be removed except by impeachment, which, except under the most extraordinary circumstances, is impractical.

It is well known that with responsibility comes caution. The recall would make people cautious in the exercise of the right. The very fact that we had the law of the recall would create a steadiness of purpose and feeling of responsibility in the people that would far outweigh indiscretions that might possibly occur.

It is odd that those who oppose the purposes of securing the nearest we can to popular government should assume mistakes by the people while they give no excuse for the innumerable mistakes of the courts. I refer you to the findings of the courts for the most contradictory decisions imaginable. In nearly all of several thousand volumes of reports of decisions in this country you will, on examination, find that the courts have overruled, reversed, and revised the decisions of judges so often that no one can say what the law is. Everyone is presumed to know the law, and yet no one does know the law.

The legal procedure would not be more simplified by the recall, but it would impress judges with the fact that they should consider the side of the public with as much care as they do the side of the individual. There is an old saying that what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and it seems that in the interpretation of constitutions and statutes it has often been nobody's business to keep the interpretation consistent with a common national purpose.

The judges should keep a little closer to the people, and with the law of recall it is quite likely they will; not that they should be unfair to individuals, for that would not be serving the public's best interest. The public is most interested in keeping private rights consistent. The public is most interested in preserving private rights, for the public is merely an aggregation of individuals, but the public is opposed to special favors to individuals.

I do not, of course, think it practicable for the public in general to enter into all the intricacies of the law, but the people are fair and will treat those whom they trust with that duty with great consideration and respect, and the law of recall will furnish a moral influence that will be of inestimable value to the common interests of the country.

Whenever we generally establish laws for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall to apply to all matters that pertain to the public interest in connection with the administration of the affairs of the people in common, we shall find the responsibility accepted and dealt with by the public in such manner as will make it much easier for public officials to do their duty unincumbered by the influence of special interests. Get the great office-holding body of this country to understand that they owe their places to the public and that instead of being interested in the public just before each election they are to be interested all the time, it will make everybody independent to do what seems best.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I am a friend of the people of Arizona and of New Mexico, and I want to do all I can to protect their rights and promote their general welfare. For years these good people have been knocking at the doors of Congress for justice, for relief, for their rights, and the Congress has turned to them a deaf ear. They are American citizens, and they want the rights of American citizens.

The people of New Mexico and Arizona want to govern themselves. They want statehood, and they should be admitted as States. The people of Arizona and New Mexico want to make their own laws. They should be admitted as States. For 40 years they have been begging Congress for this fundamental right, and for 40 years Congress has closed to their appeals the doors of opportunity, of equal rights, of justice, and of statehood. How much longer must they plead? How much longer must they wait? The refusal of Congress to grant them statehood is a substantial denial of constitutional rights, and contrary to the spirit of our free institutions.

Let us stop treating Arizona and New Mexico like conquered provinces. Let us grant them the rights they demand. Let us permit these Territories to come into the Union, so that they can govern themselves and make their own laws. The people of these Territories are as brave, as honest, as intelligent, and as patriotic as any other citizens in our land. They want to govern themselves. They want home rule. They demand statehood. Let us be true to ourselves and grant them all the rights and all the privileges enjoyed by all the rest of the citizens of the States of the Union. New Mexico must be a State. Arizona must be a State. Now is the time to grant them this sovereign boon.

The people of Arizona and New Mexico want the right to govern themselves, and sooner or later it must be granted to them. I know something about that vast domain. I know something about the sentiment of the people who live there, and I stand here and declare, with the confident knowledge that I can not be successfully contradicted, that the people of these Territories—the people who have gone there, and who have lived there for years, and who are bona fide residents of these Territories, and intend to stay there during the rest of their lives—I know what they want, and I declare here that they want what every other Territory has received, and that is statehood. They want the right that every other State in the Union has—the right to make their own laws, to levy their own taxes, to regulate their own internal affairs, and to spend the money gathered by the tax collector for their own use, for their own schools and for their own charitable institutions. Should this substantial right to these Territories longer be denied by Congress?

Why not give Arizona and New Mexico statehood and let them govern themselves? The principles of self-government are dear to the American heart. They constitute the corner stone of the Republic. The people in Arizona, the people in New Mexico are entitled to home rule, are entitled to self-government, and the only way they can get it is through the agency of statehood.

Hence, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the pending bill to admit these Territories of Arizona and New Mexico to statehood, and I indulge the hope that the day is not far distant when they will be States in the Union with all the rights and all the privileges of all the other States under and by virtue of the Federal Constitution.

[Mr. SABATH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

By unanimous consent, leave to revise and extend remarks on the subject of the statehood bill was granted to Mr. KAHN, Mr. MCCALL, Mr. CAMERON, Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. SAUNDERS, Mr. HARDY, Mr. WILLIS, Mr. LITTLETON, Mr. RAKER, Mr. BORLAND, Mr. SABATH, Mr. SULZER, and Mr. LINDBERGH.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, general debate having closed, I ask that the resolution be reported and read.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House, general debate having closed, the Clerk will report the resolution for amendment.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KENDALL. For a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENDALL. Before the Clerk begins to read the resolution I want to inquire when the right of amendment will arise.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I did not hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KENDALL. I inquired of the Chair what would be the ruling of the Chair as to when amendments would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman, that in his opinion the regular order will be the reading of the original resolution by sections, and that at the conclusion of each section amendments to the original resolution will be in order; that is, down to line 6, on page 3. After that the committee amendment, which is a substitute, will be read as a whole, and it will then be open for amendment. The Clerk will again report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

Resolved, etc., That the constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of New Mexico, elected in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, etc." approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which said constitutional convention met at Santa Fe., N. Mex., on the 3d day of October, A. D. 1910, and adjourned November 21, A. D. 1910, and which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified electors of the Territory of New Mexico, at an election held according to law on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1911, being republican in form and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and complying with the terms of said enabling act, be, and the same is hereby, approved, subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution reaffirming the boundary line between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico," approved on the 60th day of February, A. D. 1911.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 10, by striking out the word "sixtieth" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "sixteenth."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of Arizona, elected in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, etc." approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which said constitutional convention met at Phoenix, Ariz., on the 10th day of October, A. D. 1910, and adjourned December 9, A. D. 1910, and which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified electors of the Territory of Arizona at an election held according to law on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1911, being republican in form and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and complying with the terms of said enabling act, be, and the same is hereby, approved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out section 2 of the resolution and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Territory of Arizona be admitted into this Union as a State with the constitution which was formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of Arizona elected in accordance with the terms of the enabling act, approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified voters of the Territory of Arizona at an election held according to law on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1911, upon the fundamental condition, however, that article 8 of the said constitution of Arizona, in so far as it relates to the "recall of public officers," shall be held and construed not to apply to judicial officers, and that the people of Arizona shall give their assent to such construction of article 8 of the said constitution.

"That within 30 days after the passage of this resolution and its approval by the President, the President shall certify the fact to the governor of Arizona, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of such certificate from the President, issue his proclamation for an election by the qualified voters of Arizona, to be held not earlier than 60 nor later than 90 days thereafter, at which election the qualified voters of Arizona shall vote upon the proposition that "Article 8 of the constitution, in so far as it relates to 'recall of public officers,' shall be held and construed not to apply to judicial officers," and shall also vote for State and county officers, members of the State legislature, and Representatives in Congress, and all other officers provided for in said constitution of Arizona; said election to be held and the returns thereof made, canvassed, and certified as provided in section 23 of the enabling act approved June 20, 1910.

"If a majority of the qualified voters of Arizona voting at such election ratify and adopt the herein proposed construction of article 8 of the constitution, the same shall be and become a part of the said constitution, and said article 8 of said constitution, in so far as it relates to the "recall of public officers," shall have like effect as if judicial officers were expressly excepted therefrom.

"If the proposed construction of said article 8 of the constitution is duly ratified and adopted by the qualified voters of Arizona, the election of officers at the same election shall be and become valid and effective.

"When said election as to the proposed construction of the said constitution and of State and county officers, members of the legislature, and Representatives in Congress, and other officers provided for in said constitution has been held, the result thereof shall at once be certified by the governor of the Territory of Arizona to the President of the United States, and if the proposed construction of article 8 of the said constitution of Arizona has been ratified and adopted by a majority of the qualified voters of Arizona voting at such election, the President of the United States shall immediately make proclamation thereof and of the result of the election of officers, and upon the issuance of said proclamation by the President of the United States, Arizona shall, without other proceeding, be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union by virtue of this joint resolution, upon the terms and conditions of the said enabling act approved June 20, 1910, except as modified herein, and on an equal footing with the other States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, my home is in Los Angeles, Cal. I had not intended to speak as early in the session as this, but I am so concerned in the initiative, referendum, and recall that I can not sit quietly by and have a vote upon this question without saying a word or two.

Before I go further, and for fear I may not distinctly say it before my short time is over, I want to declare now that I am in favor of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, and that I am in favor of the recall of judges as well. [Applause.]

In the city of Los Angeles we have had the initiative, the referendum, and the recall for almost 10 years, and each succeeding election has shown that the people of my city are more strongly in favor of all three of those propositions than they were at the previous election. [Applause.]

Take the initiative. In the city of Sacramento the wisdom of that proposition has been well demonstrated. Within the last few years the city council of Sacramento, being tied down by a great corporation in the State of California, refused to allow another railroad corporation to build a competing line through that city; but the people found in their charter and ordinances a provision which allowed the initiative to be invoked, and it was invoked, with the result, if my recollection serves me right, that by a vote of 45 to 1 the people of the city of Sacramento voted to have this competing corporation build its lines through the city. [Applause.] From that time to this the city of Sacramento has grown apace.

In the city of Los Angeles we have had demonstrations of the usefulness of the initiative, as well as the goodly effect of the referendum.

Let me call to your attention a particular instance of the value of the referendum. Some years ago, without any previous notice to the people, a measure was brought before the city council granting to a corporation the free use forever for railroad purposes of the river bed that goes through Los Angeles. To make a long story short, that ordinance was passed by the city council. It only awaited the signature of the mayor, who was away; but before the mayor returned the people were getting ready for a referendum and recall. The final result was that because of the referendum and the recall which would follow, the city council retracted and took back everything that they had done, and to-day Los Angeles is possessed of a river bed of inestimable value for many uses. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia whether it is his intention to press this matter to a vote to-night, if that is the temper of the House?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; we certainly want to get a vote to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. In consequence of this action and in consequence of their having the referendum and the recall in their charter the people of Los Angeles are still possessed of this wonderful river bed that can be made an inlet and an outlet for the future commerce of that city, the value of which can not be determined to-day. It runs into the millions, and we have it under our own control because the initiative, the referendum, and the recall are in our charter. [Applause.]

We have had the practical value of the recall clearly demonstrated. A little over two years ago Los Angeles avoided a serious municipal scandal by recalling its mayor and electing in his place a strong and sturdy citizen who served out the unexpired term, was then elected by an increased plurality for a two-year term, and this fall will be reelected for still another term, and by a larger vote than ever.

Now, as to the recall of judges. That is not yet within our city charter, but it soon will be a part of the constitution of the State of California, and after the 10th day of next October, at which time that question will be passed upon, you men will know as well as I do that the State of California will forever and forever retain the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. [Applause.] Is there any reason on earth why a judge should not be subjected to the same laws, the same rules that govern the mayor and the city council and the governor and the legislators of a State? None whatever. I am not a lawyer. I do not know how to plead as you men do. I am only one of the plain people come to you to talk in a plain way about what we believe you lawyers should help us do, and that is to make judges as well as other officers subject to the recall.

You Members know of man after man who has stood on this floor and discussed certain questions for which all of you in turn probably have taken him to task, alleging that he did not know what he was talking about; that he was wrong about this legal question or that; and yet is that man any different if the next moment he is made a judge of some particular court? Not a bit of it. He does not know any more law, and there is no reason why he should not be subjected to having criticisms made in the way of a recall.

Furthermore, you men, as lawyers, recall a judge every day. Some one of you somewhere does. Why and how? A criminal is arrested, the case is before the court, and you ask for a change of venue. Why? You allege that the judge is prejudiced; that you can not get a fair trial before that judge. Why do you do that?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I should like to, and will at some other time, but I beg to be excused at this time, for I have not time. You ask for a change of venue because you say you have not confidence in the judge. Is not that a recall? Have not the people as much right collectively as you have individually to allege that they would like to have a change of venue, to wit, a change of judges? [Laughter and applause.]

Then after you have asked for and got the change of venue you are not satisfied. You virtually say, "Put the defendant over into the other court and I will be satisfied." Then are you satisfied? No; you take exception to every single ruling that the new judge makes. [Laughter.] Why do you do it? Because you are not satisfied, and you say you do not believe the man knows the law, and you go on to a higher court, and from that to a higher court; and finally you get to the Supreme Court of the United States, and then you are not satisfied unless the judgment is in your favor, and you ask for a rehearing. You would do still more than that if you had any opportunity. [Laughter.]

No man can possibly have greater respect for the bench than I have. I believe the right kind of a judge will not be swerved from his honest opinions through fear of the recall, neither will he be influenced by political bureaus of any kind.

Gentlemen, I might talk on; I am so full of this subject that I could talk for an hour. Apropos of that I want to tell you a story. Out in Los Angeles we have a good many Chinamen, who ordinarily understand and speak English fairly well, but when brought into court can not do either, and always ask for an interpreter. A certain Chinaman was arrested for killing a dog, and brought to trial in a justice's court. During the trial the prosecuting attorney asked, "What time was this dog killed?" The Chinaman did not understand, and so the interpreter put a question to him that took about two minutes. The Chinaman gave an answer fully as long. The interpreter turned to the court and said, "Your honor, him say 3 o'clock." [Laughter.]

Now, I could talk for an hour or longer on this subject, but I would like to say "3 o'clock." I believe that unless you favor the majority report as put in by the committee you will do the committee and the country a great wrong, because the initiative and referendum and recall are coming sure, the recall of judges as well. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment, but in opposition to the argument of the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS]. The instance which is cited by the gentleman from California, in which cases are removed by changes of venue, recalls to my mind one of the most striking arguments against the adoption of the provision for the recall of the judiciary that has been heard in this Chamber since this discussion began. The gentleman is incorrect in his assumption that the changes of venue are asked because of the prejudiced state of mind of the judge; but, on the contrary, where the demand is attributed in one case to the mental attitude of a judge, it is attributed in a thousand instances to the inflamed state of the public mind. [Applause.] That has been the history of nearly all such proceedings since our Government was founded. We have had instances of it in nearly every State in the Union.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that there are only five States in the Union that permit a transfer of a case on the ground of the bias and prejudice of a judge?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. If that is true, it only adds force to my argument, because of the fact that wise men framed the constitutions of the various States of this Republic. If so few of them expressly guard against it, it proves the evil of small proportions.

Mr. Chairman, during the closing of the general debate two very able gentlemen, leading the discussion for the adoption of this measure as reported by the committee, came from the State of Virginia, and in the closing sentences of one of those gentlemen, the chairman of the committee in charge of the measure, he suggested that certain steps might be taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania—my colleague [Mr. OLMSTED]—with reference to conditions in our State.

In the course of his argument against the adoption of this measure as it now stands affecting the people of New Mexico, he stated that a great evil had been brought into existence by the people of that State in gerrymandering the Territory of New Mexico in such a manner as to prevent the people from amending their constitution that would guarantee them justice in the future. Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest this to the people of New Mexico: They must follow one of two schools of politics; they must follow one of two political leaderships—that which brought the measure into the Sixty-first Congress or that which produced the measure before us for consideration now. The one before us now is fathered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], and he says in effect that because of the fact there was a gerrymander in the Territory of New Mexico, therefore that Territory is corporation ridden. Mr. Chairman, if a gerrymander is evidence of a control by corporations I want to suggest from the records of the Sixty-first Congress the most flagrant case of a violation of the spirit of the law which the gentleman complains of is found in the State from which the gentleman himself hails. The most vicious gerrymander that has come under the observation of the Congress of the United States in the last 10 years was perpetrated in the State of Virginia in 1908, and I will state the instance and cite the law. It is not so far back that the memory of every man in this House——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, under the constitution of Virginia it is provided that apportionment shall be made as nearly as practical with an equal number of inhabitants in each district. Under the act of 1906 the fifth district of Virginia had a population of 175,000. The unit of population provided for in the general measure was 180,000.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I submit I am discussing the evils of a form of apportionment under the constitutions of the States in this Union, and I am citing the act of the legislature under the constitution of the State of Virginia in proof of my argument, and, if it is pertinent and virtuous, then I am in order; if it is vicious and impertinent, then I am out of order, and so is the State of Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed in order.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, under the apportionment act of 1906 the fifth district of Virginia——

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking to the amendment.

Mr. BOOHER. The point of order is that there is nothing in this amendment concerning the apportionment of New Mexico or Virginia, or any other place. It touches only the recall of judges.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing the adoption of the constitution in the amended form proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair if the point of order is insisted upon that the amendment before the committee relates wholly to the admission of Arizona.

And it seems to the Chair that if the point of order is insisted on the point will be sustained.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it would have been very easy for me to move to strike out the last word and take the time, but I do not wish to do that. My suggestion, Mr. Chairman, is this: That under that act this district had 275,000 inhabitants. Two years later——

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will not save any time by it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not desire to unnecessarily delay the committee, but if what I have to say is to be said at all, it will require more than five minutes. I therefore ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes, but if the committee does not desire it, I shall not feel aggrieved.

Mr. CANNON. Is this upon the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not speaking to a point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] has yielded the floor, and I have taken the floor in my own right.

Mr. CANNON. I was under a misapprehension. I did not understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had given up the floor.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is under a misapprehension.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The Chair having ruled without having asked any discussion upon the point of order, I yielded the floor.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to have my request stated, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will say that I will not object to this, but I will object hereafter to any extensions.

Mr. FERRIS. That statement coming from a gentleman on the other side, and there being a decided opinion on this proposition, I do not think it would be fair to yield 15 minutes to a gentleman on one side with a notice served that they would not give an equal time on the other side.

Mr. SHERLEY. Fifteen minutes have been used on the other side. I have not spoken during general debate. However, it is with the committee. I do not care to attempt to say in five minutes what can not be said in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois goes to the crux of the debate that has engaged the attention of the committee for a week. I am one of those who believe that if the constitution of Arizona contained a provision twice as drastic and far-reaching as the one it does contain in regard to the recall of the judiciary that that would not be a sufficient reason for this Congress to deny it statehood. [Applause.] The requirement of the Constitution that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government is not neglected in the admission of Arizona. I hold a republican form of government to be one whose creation springs from and whose continuation must rest upon the consent of those subject to its dominion. Judged by this rule, the form of government created by the people of Arizona is republican. But while I believe this, yet there is no man upon the floor who has a more pronounced objection to the recall of the judiciary than I have, and because I desire to answer the very pertinent question of the gentleman from California as to why a judge should not be recalled as well as any other official, I have taken the floor and the time of the committee. It is sometimes worth while to consider the purpose of government as well as its form, and that purpose should be not simply to execute the will of a majority, but to safeguard to any and all citizens those rights that the experience of mankind has demonstrated as essential to the enjoyment of real liberty. It is true that all power comes from the people, but it is equally true that all people loving and possessing real liberty, and history, to my mind, points not a single exception, have seen the wisdom in their calm moments of so restricting themselves in the exercise of that power as to prevent hasty and unfair action in their excited moments.

Every limitation you have in a written constitution, the very purpose of a written constitution itself, testifies to the need of the people limiting and restricting their power. We are told that whenever we question their exercise of power that we distrust them. I reply that they themselves in their wisdom have mistrusted themselves. And I suggest this fundamental thought, that the test of a government, the test of the institutions of a government, comes in the crises of its life and not in ordinary peaceful times.

When the people of some State have stood in a crisis, with hunger staring the great majority in the face, when they have stood in the crisis of bankruptcy, with debts so heavy that it seemed impossible to pay them, and under that test have exercised the recall with wisdom, then I am willing to believe that the people need not restrain themselves.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON] in his eloquent speech this morning said that, unfortunately, he could cite no history in justification of his view, because no nation had seen fit practically to exercise the recall of judges. It so happens that in my own State of Kentucky this issue, in its essence, was fought out amid the searching times and trying scenes of State bankruptcy, when the debtor class outnumbered the creditor class two to one; and the history of that fight, the history of the experience of those people, may well serve as a warning to the people of America against undertaking to make the judiciary by recall answerable to a majority.

But before I read that history let me say this to the House: The reason why the judge is not in the same attitude toward the public as other officials are is because by the very virtue of his office he is frequently the shield, and the only shield, of the minority of the community. You can test and judge the civilization of a people by the rights that are reserved by them to a minority, no matter how small it may be; and the mere numerical strength of a people can never give them a right, according to all the theories of American government, to take away certain rights of the individual.

Not only is that a reason, and to my mind a fundamental reason, but the judiciary is also charged with the high and important function of determining when the executive and legislative branches exceed their proper functions, and this right and duty is the highest contribution of the great statesmen of the Revolution to the science of government. It is the very capstone of the Constitution, without which all guaranties of the Constitution must be in danger whenever passion sways the body of the people. In that sense it is not the equal, but the superior of the other two branches, and to make it answerable to the people by a recall—for it is now truly answerable to the sober judgment of the people—to make it answerable to the temporary judgment of the people is to destroy absolutely the function that it is called upon to exercise, that function of judgment, and not simply of execution, of the majority will.

Now to refer to the bit of history: Kentucky chartered, during the years from 1817 to 1828, innumerable banks of issue, and through them was undertaken the old scheme of creating wealth by legislation instead of by labor. These banks issued bank notes and allowed credit without any regard to the property and the value that underlay the notes or the persons applying for credit. There came pay day, as there always will come pay day, and the people of that State awoke to find themselves bankrupt. What did they do? The debtors were in the majority. They elected men to the legislature who reflected their viewpoint, and the legislature passed replevin laws and execution laws, undertaking to prevent the collection of debts. Then what happened? The courts of the State of Kentucky declared those laws unconstitutional. And then what happened? The logic of events is wonderfully impressive. Why, this same majority that was represented by the legislature and that caused it to pass laws to relieve men of the payment of their debts undertook to remove the judges. Under the constitution, as it then existed, there lay a power of address to the governor, an address by two-thirds of the houses, for the removal of a judge. The repudiators controlled the majority of the legislature, but they could not get the two-thirds necessary to remove those judges by address. So they proceeded to abolish the court and with it the judges who had declared unconstitutional the laws that undertook to enable men to get out of the payment of their just debts. The court declined to be abolished, and held the act abolishing them and creating a new court of appeals unconstitutional; and there was thus presented the spectacle in the State of Kentucky of two courts of last resort.

The politics of that day resolved itself into a fight between the old court and the new court. In the meanwhile men were leaving Kentucky as if it were a place of pestilence. For every man who came into this then border State there were more than four going out of it. Everyone was in debt, everything was gloomy and forlorn.

But finally the people awoke to the realization that no community can ever sustain itself by repudiation of its honest debts. They upheld the old court party, they elected a legislature that repealed all the laws that had been passed by the new court party undertaking to change the judiciary, and the new court passed out of existence, and to-day its decisions are treated as a nullity.

I would like, if my brief time permitted, to further recite the history of this period to show the passion and animosity of a portion of the people inflamed by demagogic leaders against the judges whose only offenses were refusals to uphold laws making unnecessary the payment of just debts. But I can only hope that you will read the history of those 10 years of stirring times in the State of Kentucky, read the admirable summary in Sumner's Life of Jackson, and answer me, How long would a judge have sat upon the bench if there had been the power to recall him in those days when men's passion and their debts were controlling their reason and their judgment? [Applause.]

Those judges would have been recalled overnight, and the State of Kentucky would have been plunged into the mire of repudiation, and her history, glorious as it is, would have been checked for a generation. Any man here, in his calm, quiet moments, could properly arm himself without danger to society; but there is no man here of sense and intelligence but would refuse to carry a pistol, not because of the fear of himself during his calm moments, but because of the fear of himself under excitement and provocation. So the people in their calm moments would not abuse the right of recall. But the test of a people is in the crises of State and national life, even as the tests of men are in the personal crises of their lives. The times that try men's souls are the times that must determine the fitness of the recall. Under that test I say to you that the people may well keep from themselves that power for hasty, ill-conceived action, that will always carry with it the execution, not of the people's real will, but simply the immediate execution of the passions of the people.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] well called attention to the history of England. Englishmen began to have real liberty when they obtained a judiciary that was free and independent. The persecution of the British subjects came when the Crown had the right to recall the judiciary, and when the judge who did not do as the Crown desired lost his official position and usually lost with it his head, and a judge was put in his place who would be subservient. That is what the recall meant then. Under modern government it means that the temporary passions of the people may have expression rather than their sober judgment.

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts when he made his comparison, but I hesitated to do so, and so I heard him through. Does the gentleman from Kentucky think it is fair to compare the recall of judges by the Crown with the recall of judges by the people?

Mr. SHERLEY. I answer the gentleman by saying that a good king——

Mr. FERRIS. There is none.

Mr. SHERLEY. I agree with the idea of the gentleman that underlies his answer, that society can not afford to put its government in the hands of any one man; and yet, using the term as it properly can be used, and not subject to any legitimate exception, a good king would not wrongly use such power. A people in their calmness will not wrongly use such power; but I say to you that the history of the world has shown that the people, like the individuals who compose the mass, under stress of excitement will do temporary wrong, wrong that they will regret as much as anyone in the world; and the whole purpose of government, the whole reason for every constitution that has ever been written, has been to give the people an opportunity to pause. Otherwise why the limitations? Why do you have the limitation that no one shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law"? Why any of the other amendments to the Constitution? If the people can under all circumstances always be relied upon to do the right thing, of what need is a constitution? Why, we spend half our time here determining not only what we ought to do, but what under the sovereign law of the Nation we can do. What a mistake, what a travesty it all is, if always the people can trust themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I have not thus far participated in this debate, and at this time I shall only make two observations. The first is that if the people of Arizona can not be trusted to determine this question of the recall of judges for themselves, they are not capable of self-government at all [applause], and ought not to be admitted into this Union. If they can not be trusted to determine that question, then they can not be trusted to determine any other question in their constitution. [Applause.]

Second, it has been said a great many times on this floor during this debate that the accountability of judges to the people by way of recall is something entirely new in government, an innovation in governmental affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to read, for I do not believe it has been read on this floor in this debate, two sections from the constitution of the staid, old, conservative State of Massachusetts. Their constitution was adopted in 1780, and, so far as these provisions are concerned, they still remain in it and a part of the declaration of rights. The fifth section of the declaration reads as follows:

All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, judicial, are their substitutes and agents and are at all times accountable to them.

Section 8 reads as follows:

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life, and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question of recall of judges is a debatable one. For myself, I should be unwilling to have the recall apply to the judges with the same facility, with the same low percentage, that I would see it applied to other officials of the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not a question for this Congress to decide; it is a question for the people of each State to decide for themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in listening to the very eloquent speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLETON] to-day, and especially his peroration where he compared the people exercising the recall to the mob who crucified the Saviour, I felt that I should be sorry indeed to have anyone believe that the people of my congressional district or any other in settling such questions as this would act as a mob. So far as the people are concerned they are as intelligent, as patriotic, as law-abiding as any Member of this House. There is a distinction, Mr. Chairman, as wide as the wideness of the sea between the action of the mob and the action of the people of a State or a congressional district expressing their will in an orderly way under the provisions of law, going to the polls and registering their will as to the kind of government they shall have, and who shall represent them, whether it be with reference to judicial, administrative, or legislative officials.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say a word during this debate. I have listened with much pleasure and something of profit to the debate on the pending bill. I shall not address myself in the five minutes I have to the initiative and referendum. I shall vote for the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

It is a little trite, perhaps, and yet a matter not fully understood by many people, that ours is not a direct democracy, but is a representative government, controlled by the people through the ballot at frequent elections held under the law. I see no danger to the public welfare in keeping it a representative government. No State, I believe, elects a governor for a longer term than four years. The popular body of the respective State legislatures is usually elected for two years and the senate for four years. One-third of the Senate of the United States goes out of office every two years, and the body changes completely in six years, as provided under the Constitution and the laws. The House of Representatives of the United States changes every two years. I do not believe it would be politic to have a recall for Members of Congress or members of the State legislatures or for governors or judges. If there be misdemeanor or crime upon the part of the individual Representative or Senator, there can be an expulsion, and if he commit a crime he is subject to the penalty of the law, the same as other citizens.

If the sound popular sentiment, or sometimes the unsound popular sentiment, of a district or State demands that a new Representative or Senator should be chosen, the people speak by a majority at the ballot box. Then there may be impeachment of judges and impeachment of officials, as provided in the Constitution of the United States and by the constitutions of the several States.

The question, however, that comes directly to us in the consideration of this bill is whether we shall approve the constitution of Arizona, which provides for the recall of judges on the demand of one-fourth of the voters of the proposed State. As to New Mexico, I will content myself merely with saying that I believe New Mexico should be admitted, and that within the past three months the House of Representatives unanimously so decided. But here is a bill that practically provides that New Mexico shall be kept out until Arizona comes in. That is the real question. You propose practically that Arizona shall come in with the recall of judges of the courts in her constitution. The Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State a government republican in form. I take it that means also in substance as well as in form.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object, but I desire to say that while I am not going to object to any extension of time for the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, we have had seven days of debate on this amendment, and hereafter I shall object to any extension of time upon the part of anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have said on both sides of the House that when a State is once in the Union it can adopt any kind of an amendment to its constitution that it may desire, including a provision for the recall of judges. I respectfully dissent from that proposition.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. So long as it is not unrepublican in form.

Mr. CANNON. What is "republican in form"? In my judgment a constitution or law of a State that provides for a direct government by a democracy as against a representative government by the people is not a "republican government in form." Some years ago we admitted the State of Utah with a solemn statement in the enabling act that Utah never should amend her constitution so as to legalize polygamy. Now, then, how would you enforce such a contract? If Utah can not amend her constitution legalizing polygamy, Idaho and Wyoming or any other State, and Arizona and New Mexico, if they are admitted as States, can not change their constitutions by adopting an amendment legalizing polygamy. Is there any Member of this House that will rise in his place and say that the United States is powerless, in the event any State should amend its constitution legalizing polygamy, to nullify that constitution by virtue of the constitutional power in the United States to guarantee each State a government republican in form? I pause for an answer. No man disputes the power of the United States in the premises. I may go further and say it is the duty of the United States in such case to enforce the guaranty of the Constitution of the United States. Let me put another case which perhaps you will say is an extreme case. If any State should provide that the governor should hold his office for life and that his oldest son or daughter should succeed him for life, would the United States be powerless to nullify that amended constitution?

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I only have 10 minutes. No man would question the right of the United States to exercise the power and the propriety of its exercising the power to nullify that amended constitution. The courts of the United States and the courts of the respective States construe the law and apply it to each case so as to protect each citizen in his liberty, his life, and his property. They should perform their function without fear, favor, or affection. If the judge is corrupt, he is subject to impeachment and removal from office. The judge should be, and usually is, able and courageous, and be it said to the credit of the judiciary they have both of these qualities, and these qualities are essential for the protection of all the people under all conditions, from the mob on the one hand and the plutocrat on the other.

To the Member from California [Mr. STEPHENS], who proclaims himself as one of "the plain people," I will say that he and every other man who belongs to the plain people—and I am tolerably plain myself—is more interested in preserving the integrity, the manhood, and the courage of the judiciary than those who have great fortunes. [Applause.] Therefore I am going to vote against this bill, for the reason that it places it expressly within the power of Arizona to adopt a constitution with a provision for a recall of judges, and that, too, on the petition of one-fourth of the voters of the State or district. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I would prefer not, unless I can have additional time.

Mr. Speaker, the judge should not be subject to the threat of the strong or the cry of the mob armed with the bludgeon, called the recall, to avoid which he must make the will of one or the other the judgment of the court.

The courts in the history of the Republic have performed their functions in harmony with the law and the Constitution. Allow me to give you an instance of great importance.

In the settlement of the country across the continent transportation of persons and products became a necessity. The cry was for the construction of railways. To secure the same nearly all the States, by legislation, gave 99-year charters—many of them perpetual charters—to railway corporations, with full power to fix the charges for transportation of persons and products.

The rates fixed by the railways in many instances were exorbitant. It was claimed that the railways, by virtue of the franchise, had a vested right to fix the charge. It was conceded generally by the lawyers, harking back to the Dartmouth College case and a long line of precedents, that the claim of the railways was valid.

But when the case was presented to the courts they held that while the railways were private property, they were also public utilities, and that their charge for service must be reasonable.

I am not afraid of the courts. But, gentlemen, if I were to discuss this matter from a political standpoint—which I am not doing now—I would say that I wish the House of Representatives were elected once in four years. I wish the President were elected once in eight years, because, looking in your faces and casting my glance inward—and I am not saying that I am better than you or much worse than you—you know that when you go back to your close districts every two years you find that not only corporations, but men who proclaim themselves the friends of the plain people, are good for more votes, or claim to be, in your districts than you like to acknowledge, and they put you under a threat that they will bring their organization, whatever it may be, religious or secular, to the defeat of Members that do not take orders. You may say a man who would take orders from anyone is not worthy to hold a seat here. Oh, gentlemen, the human animal is a practical animal, and when somebody is making war on a Member of Congress out in his district, first for the nomination, then for an election, there is a temptation to respond to the demand that is made. When some wild-eyed sand-lotter in former years in San Francisco was carrying on a great movement against immigration, not only to restrict, but to entirely exclude, I have seen some California Representatives turn double somersaults in order to respond to a temporary demand. [Applause and laughter.] Of course, my friend from California [Mr. STEPHENS] has no feeling of that kind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] moves the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KONIG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in the amendment. I will not make any apology for violating the much-violated custom of this House prohibiting new Members from speaking during the first session of Congress which they attend, but being deeply interested in the question now before this committee, namely, the admission into the Union of New Mexico and Arizona, I must give my views on the subject. These Territories come to us with constitutions embodying matters which, if I were asked and had the power to insert in the constitution of the ancient and honorable State of Maryland, I would refuse to do it. But, Mr. Chairman, Arizona, in making its constitution, did not make it to govern Massachusetts or Connecticut. It drafted it with one purpose, and one purpose only, namely, to govern the people of the Territory of Arizona. If they have made a mistake, they will soon discover it and correct it, and, anyway, my friends, it is Arizona's funeral, not ours. The friends of the recall tell us that there is no danger in a recall, because the people can always be trusted. Firm believer that I am in the people, knowing after sound and sober second thought that the people will come to a right conclusion, yet I believe that in particular cases they often can and do go wrong. Like the individual who places his belongings in some secure place, where he can not reach them to satisfy every passing passion and fancy, I believe that the public should place checks on itself so that it may not be carried away with every fancy of the hour.

I suppose I shall vote wrong while I am in Congress. I presume that a good many of you gentlemen have voted wrong. And, after all, who are the people but Tom Jones and Bill Brown and you and me, my friends? That being so, if we have voted wrong, why can not the people in the several States of this Union vote wrong? It is a well-known fact that the statesman gives the people what they ought to have; the politician gives them what they want. Look out, therefore, my friends, lest ye make a politician out of the judge.

My conception of the thing is that a judge should be a judge of the law and the facts, and nothing else. We should put him as far above the clamoring mob as we put him above the purchasing power of the capitalist. As I said before, the people are ofttimes wrong, and the best illustration I can give of that is the last national election. In that election the people of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania voted to uphold and maintain the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and it was a majority of the people of Pennsylvania that voted for the law as it now stands, while the people of the great Empire State of New York voted to repudiate, to strike out forever and a day after, that same Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and that was the great majority of the people of the Empire State. One or the other was wrong, and whichever was wrong, it was a majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] is recognized.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KONIG. If the gentleman is looking for something about the principles laid down by the late Republican leader, Theodore Roosevelt, on the question whether marriage was a failure, race suicide, or the broken promises of the Republican Party, I will answer him; otherwise my time is too precious. I shall vote, Mr. Chairman, for the admission of both New Mexico and Arizona. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized. The gentleman from Maryland will come to order. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, during the discussions in this debate, if one were to give full credit to many of the speakers, it could be easily inferred that the courts of this country are crowded with judges who would be intimidated if we had the law of recall. There can be no other inference from some of the remarks made, and the same speakers seem to consider the people in the light of a mob.

The assumption that judges are moral cowards that would violate the oaths of office is not justified; neither is there justification in assuming that the people exercising the right of recall would do so in the spirit of a mob.

It might be wise to provide that the recall of judges, more than other officials, should be surrounded with longer time for public deliberation before the recall was actually made, but that would be a question for the people in their good judgment. That is a matter of detail not going to the question of the policy of recall.

The whole question is one of whether the people shall be brought in closer relation with the actual administration of the Government.

There is a difference between a government limited as by the Federal Constitution and a people's or popular government run by popular choice. I make that distinction in order that my few statements may not be misunderstood.

The United States is not, within strict interpretation, a people's or popular government, but is a constitutional government. The United States may be said to be governed by the people except where the Constitution represses. That instrument does limit the majority. It makes no difference that originally the people, through their servants, framed the Constitution. Those who did that have long since gone and are no longer the people. They left posterity an instrument that limits in several respects the privilege of majority rule.

The only time that this country was in a position to be governed by the people was the period of 12 years between the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the Constitution. Since that time it clearly appears, by interpretation of the courts enforced by judicial decrees, that the people are not entirely in possession nor control of their own Government. In one respect it would require unanimous consent, or practically so, to change the Constitution. For instance:

> No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

The State of New York, with near 10,000,000 people, has no greater representation in the Senate than the State of Nevada, with a population of 81,000; that is, one person in Nevada has a representation in the Senate equal to 123 in New York. Even if all the other States should decide by unanimous vote that each State should have a representation in the Senate in proportion to population, such a decision could be nullified by a majority of the State of Nevada. There would be no way to overcome that except by revolution. There are many cases in which the Constitution prevents the people by majority to rule, the most conspicuous being the manner required to amend the Constitution itself.

The Constitution is a great instrument, and has been looked upon as evidence of the profound wisdom of its authors. The good faith and great foresight of its founders is not questioned. It must not be overlooked, however, that the Constitution was a compromise. Some of its provisions were placed there to meet certain emergencies existent at the time of its adoption, and not because in themselves they were preferred. In fact, they were, some of them, most strenuously opposed. The colonies were weak and had to compromise their differences, resulting in some provisions that have later repressed the people.

I have no sympathy with all this talk about the sacredness of old instruments of government, regardless of their fitness for this generation and the future. We can not progress and at the same time follow cumbersome old forms that really block progress. All rules made in the past that are suited, let us keep as long as experience shows them suited to present necessities, but whenever experience shows the need of change, let no fetish reverence for the past methods repress the present and future necessities.

My respect for government rests primarily in the ability of the people to conduct it. Succeeding generations should be better able to master the problem of their own than the people of earlier generations could do it for them. Each generation should conduct the affairs of its own times, and when a majority rules that can be done. So much of the past as is worth while would naturally be adopted. Now, since we have our growth principally in our native born, I do not believe we should be tied up with constitutional limitations that will prevent a majority from changing the Constitution and making such laws and regulations as shall seem best.

We can imagine wrongs that a majority could, if it would, do to a minority, but I am not with those who anticipate that the majority will be less just than a minority. We suppose this to be a government by the people, and I am willing to trust it as such. My votes, so far as I am able to cast them, will give the fullest credit to that purpose.

The objection that is pressed the hardest by some to the proposed constitution of Arizona is the provision for the recall of judges. Some have worked up their imaginations to the extent of believing that excitements might and probably would sometime arise and carry in their waves the recall of judges. It is believed by them that the people would go through all the forms required for the recall of judges who had decided cases in accordance with law. Those who carry prejudices of that nature are more considerate of the individual than of the public. Even suppose it happened several times in a century, which is not likely, the fact of the recall would not reverse the cases. They would stand as they had been decided. If the decisions were wrong, the recall would not be wholly unmerited. As things are now a judge can not be removed except by impeachment, which, except under the most extraordinary circumstances, is impractical.

It is well known that with responsibility comes caution. The recall would make people cautious in the exercise of the right. The very fact that we had the law of the recall would create a steadiness of purpose and feeling of responsibility in the people that would far outweigh indiscretions that might possibly occur.

It is odd that those who oppose the purposes of securing the nearest we can to popular government should assume mistakes by the people, while they give no excuse for the innumerable mistakes of the courts. I refer you to the findings of the courts for the most contradictory decisions imaginable. In nearly all of several thousand volumes of reports of decisions in this country, you will, on examination, find that the courts have overruled, reversed, and revised the decisions of judges so often that no one can say what the law is. Everyone is presumed to know the law and yet no one does know the law.

The legal procedure would not be more simplified by the recall, but it would impress judges with the fact that they should consider the side of the public with as much care as they do the side of the individual. There is an old saying that what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and it seems that in the interpretation of constitutions and statutes it has often been nobody's business to keep the interpretation consistent with a common national purpose. The judges should keep a little closer to the people, and with the law of recall it is quite likely they will—not that they should be unfair to individuals, for that would not be serving the public's best interest. The public is most interested in keeping private rights consistent. The public is most interested in preserving private rights—for the public is merely an aggregation of individuals—but the public is opposed to special favors to individuals.

I do not, of course, think it practicable for the public in general to enter into all the intricacies of the law; but the people are fair and will treat those whom they trust with that duty with great consideration and respect, and the law of recall will furnish a moral influence that will be of inestimable value to the common interests of the country.

Whenever we generally establish laws for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall to apply to all matters that pertain to the public interest, in connection with the administration of the affairs of the people in common, we shall find the responsibility accepted and dealt with by the public in such manner as will make it much easier for public officials to do their duty unincumbered by the influence of special interests. Get the great office-holding body of this country to understand that they owe their places to the public, that instead of being interested in the public just before each election they are to be interested all the time, and it will make everybody independent to do what seems best.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be voted down. It represents the views of the minority of the Committee on Territories. It leaves the initiative and referendum untouched in the Arizona constitution. It leaves the recall of all officers, except judges, untouched. Its real purpose is to keep Arizona out of the Union. It proposes to submit to the people of Arizona an amendment to be voted on, but these gentlemen tell them exactly how they must vote. Unless they vote as they say, they shall not come into this Union. It is unfair and unjust. The real purpose is to deny statehood to Arizona, and I hope every gentleman here will vote against it. [Applause.]

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 50, noes 142.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in accordance with the terms of the enabling act approved June 20, 1910, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth. The admission herein provided for shall take effect upon the proclamation of the President of the United States, when the conditions explicitly set forth in this joint resolution shall have been complied with, which proclamation shall issue at the earliest practicable time after the results of the election herein provided for shall have been certified to the President, and also after evidence shall have been submitted to him of the compliance with the terms and conditions of this resolution.

The President is authorized and directed to certify the adoption of this resolution to the governor of each Territory as soon as practicable after the adoption hereof, and each of said governors shall issue his proclamation for the holding of the first general election as provided for in the constitutions, respectively, heretofore adopted by each Territory, and for the submission to a vote of the electors of said Territories of the amendments of the constitutions of said proposed States, respectively, herein set forth in accordance with the terms and conditions of this joint resolution. The results of said elections shall be certified to the President by the governor of each of said Territories; and if the terms and conditions of this joint resolution shall have been complied with, the proclamation shall immediately issue by the President announcing the result of said elections so ascertained, and upon the issuance of said proclamation the proposed State or States so complying shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will suggest to the gentleman that this is not the proper time to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that, as heretofore stated by the Chair in response to a parliamentary inquiry, the substitute will be treated as one entire amendment, and amendments will not be in order until the Clerk shall have completed the reading of the substitute.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the substitute.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. This is a committee amendment, and there are two other committee amendments, one to be offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] and the other by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 23, after the words "in the," strike out the words "constitution, respectively, heretofore adopted by each Territory," and insert in lieu thereof the words "constitution of New Mexico heretofore adopted and the election ordinance No. 2 adopted by the constitutional convention of Arizona, respectively," so as to make the clause read:

"The President is authorized and directed to certify the adoption of this resolution to the governor of each Territory as soon as practicable after the adoption hereof, and each of said governors shall issue his proclamation for the holding of the first general election as provided for in the constitution of New Mexico heretofore adopted and the election ordinance No. 2 adopted by the constitutional convention of Arizona, respectively, and for the submission to a vote of the electors of said Territories of the amendments of the constitutions of said proposed States, respectively, herein set forth in accordance with the terms and conditions of this joint resolution. The results of said elections shall be certified to the President by the governor of each of said Territories; and if the terms and conditions of this joint resolution shall have been complied with, the proclamation shall immediately issue by the President announcing the result of said elections so ascertained, and upon the issuance of said proclamation the proposed State or States so complying shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make this joint resolution conform to the facts. In New Mexico the provision was made in the constitution. In Arizona it was made in an ordinance known as ordinance No. 2. When the resolution was framed by the committee, we did not observe that there was that difference in these two constitutions. We want to make the resolution conform to what took place in New Mexico, and also to what took place in Arizona.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 11, after the word "Spanish," insert the words "when newspapers in both of said languages are published in said counties."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is that if there happens to be no newspaper published in both languages there would be no need of it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a motion to strike out the last word is not in order, it being an amendment in the third degree.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to strike out the last word would be in the third degree, and under the rule would not be in order. The gentleman will be recognized in favor or against the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no apology to make for being a new Member and addressing the House. First, I believe a new Member has the same right to the floor as the older Members, and, secondly, I wish to state that it is not through choice that I am a new Member, for I made two previous efforts that were unsuccessful. [Laughter.] In regard to the question before the House at this time, I wish to say in reply to the gentlemen on both sides of the House who oppose the initiative, referendum, and recall, and who evidently fear leaving the Government in the hands of the people, I probably have been in a position to know as well, if not better, what the sentiments of the people of this country are than most any other Member of the House. I have within the last 12 months worked at my trade and otherwise associated with the intelligent workingmen, who have been discussing judges and the decisions they have rendered, and have come to the conclusion that if there is any official there is more need of the people having the power to recall than another it is the judge.

I wish to insert here an editorial written by Louis F. Post, the editor of the Public, one of the ablest and most fearless writers on the question of the initiative, referendum, and recall. This expresses my position on the question:

If the recall may properly apply to legislative representatives, who make laws, and to administrative representatives, who execute laws, by what process of reasoning shall we conclude that it must not apply to judicial representatives, who nullify laws?

President Taft is opposed to this application of the recall, but he gives no reason for distinguishing it from legislative or administrative applications, and the inference from his record and toryistic cast of mind is that he doesn't wish to. Being against the recall in every application, he merely submits for the moment to overwhelming public opinion in respect of its other applications in order the more efficiently to resist its application to judges, a use of it which has but recently come under discussion. Lacking those gymnastic mental qualities that permit his agile predecessor to advocate the recall of judges for California while opposing it for Arizona, President Taft takes positive ground against it as a principle for all places.

That it would deprive judges of dignity is one of his objections. This objection would have applied to abolishing the King's veto, which, as Mr. Asquith says, is now "as dead as Queen Anne"; and it is a very appropriate objection for the additional reason that autocratic prerogatives of aforetime British kings are asserted by the American judiciary. Not alone do our judges veto laws; through their equity jurisdiction they make laws. It is for this double power, as well as the dignity of judges, that Mr. Taft contends in his denunciation of the recall for judges. Like the great privileged interests whom he most directly represents, he finds that privilege can endure the initiative and the referendum, which affect legislation alone, and a recall that would affect administrators and legislators only, provided the judiciary remains untrammeled in its power over both administration and legislation.

Gov. Wilson, however, is not to be counted among those who oppose the judicial recall from toryistic motives. This exception is allowed not because Gov. Wilson is a Democrat, nor because he seems to be democratic, nor because, unlike Mr. Taft, he has come out for people's power in respect of such electoral mechanism as direct primaries, direct election of Senators, the initiative and referendum and the recall except for judges. From an opponent once of the initiative and referendum, Gov. Wilson has come to be one of its most effective advocates, and for right reasons. When opposing it as an author several years ago, he had not grasped the point that the initiative and referendum is not a substitute, but a palladium, for representative government. Believing now with all the rest of us who advocate the initiative and referendum, that when this reform is once in full operation it will be seldom used—probably never except on great and burning fundamental issues—because legislatures will then be as keen to represent the people as they now are to represent marauding interests, Gov. Wilson frankly declares his change of opinion. But what he does not yet appear to see is that the reason for the recall for judges is the same as the reason for its application to other representatives of the people. Indeed, he has distinctly put his objection on the ground that judges are not lawmakers, but only apply the law to individual cases. If judges did determine only individual disputes, Gov. Wilson's opposition would be quite unobjectionable. But our judges have built up a judicial system under which they exercise the kingly power of making laws at their own will by decree, of repealing statutes as unconstitutional, and of controlling administrative authority. Not as administrators of justice in private quarrels, then, is it that judges must be subjected to the recall, but because they have usurped legislative power, administrative power, and people's power in respect of the laws of the land. As in Great Britain, the King's lawmaking decree and his lawbreaking veto are as dead as Queen Anne, so must it be in this country with the judicial usurpation of making law and breaking law. When that is done, no recall for judges will be needed; until it is done, the recall of judges will be as necessary, logically and in fact, for the defense of democracy against plutocracy as any other application of the recall.

An impartial administration of justice is about all there is to a free government. It is the just administration of the law that holds the community together. It is the courts that all must go to for the protection of their liberty, person, and reputation.

The judicial department is a department in which the people are more concerned than in any other. It is the department which comes home to them and deals with them in all the relations of life, from their birth to their death, and with their heirs and estates after death.

Abraham Lincoln said, in a speech at Cincinnati, September 17, 1859:

The people of these United States are the rightful masters of both congresses and courts; not to overthrow the Constitution, but to overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution.

What would that great emancipator say if he lived at this age and witnessed the judges perverting the Constitution, as in the case of the income-tax law, where the verdict was rendered by one judge turning a double somersault overnight and reversing himself, and other judges rendering injunctions prohibiting the workingman from exercising his constitutional rights—freedom of speech and of the press—to please big business interests and industrial pirates? That great commoner would have raised his voice in protest against such methods of forcing industrial slavery.

Thomas Jefferson said:

The germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the judiciary, an irresponsible body working like gravity day by day and by night, gaining a little to-day, and gaining a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief over the fields of jurisdiction until all shall be usurped.

And again he said:

If we ever lose our liberties, it will be through the action of our Federal judiciary, who, with a life tenure of office, will feel themselves the law and construe away the dearest rights of the people.

It is my opinion that if a revolution occurs in this country in the future (which I hope will never be necessary to protect the people's rights) it will be due to the arbitrary usurpation of power by the judges.

In an article written by Hon. Henry Clay Caldwell, former United States circuit judge, presiding judge of the United States circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, he said:

It is an interesting historical fact that despotic power and official oppression received its first check in the Colonies at the hands of a New York jury. The blow was a staggering one. It was the entering wedge to freedom, which later was driven home. William Crosby was the governor of New York in 1734. In the administration of his office he was unscrupulous, avaricious, and arbitrary. The New York Journal, a paper established to defend the cause of liberty against arbitrary power, exposed his official corruption and oppression. For this its publisher, John Peter Zenger—may his tribe increase—was thrown into prison and a criminal information filed against him by the attorney general for libeling the governor and other colonial officers. History tells us the case excited intense interest, not in New York only, but in other Colonies, for it involved the vital issue of the liberty of speech and of the press, without which the people of the Colony could not hope to be free. The case was brought on for trial before Chief Justice De Lancey, whose first act was to disbar Zenger's counsel for questioning the validity of the judge's commission. Zenger's friends then sent to Philadelphia for Andrew Hamilton, one of the foremost lawyers of his time, who came on to New York to defend him. Zenger entered a plea of not guilty, admitted the publication of the alleged libel, and justified it by asserting its truth. A jury was impaneled to try the case. The chief justice refused to permit the defendant to prove the truth of the publication and charged the jury that it was libelous, and that it was their duty to return a verdict of guilty. The jury retired and soon returned with a verdict of not guilty. The verdict electrified the country. Gouverneur Morris, one of the ablest and most sagacious statesmen of the Revolutionary period, dated American liberty not from the Stamp Act of 1765, nor yet from the "Boston Tea Party," but from the verdict of the jury in Zenger's case.

The rendition of this verdict constituted the immortalizing moment of those men's lives and is the richest heritage of their descendants. If the names of these 12 patriots were at hand, they would appear here. Their names should go down in history with the foremost patriots of the Revolution. This historic incident would not be complete without adding that the people bore Zenger's lawyer, Hamilton, out of the court room on their shoulders and that the common council of New York gave him the freedom of the city in a gold box for his gratuitous services in defense of the rights of mankind and the liberty of the press.

The jury's verdict in the above case was clearly a verdict of the great masses of the people, because it was a popular verdict, and the people can always be trusted to render just and wise verdicts. The framers of the Declaration of Independence proclaimed that one of their chief grievances was that they were denied their right of trial by jury, and the judges of to-day are invading guaranteed rights by usurping power, issuing injunctions in conflict with the Constitution, and rendering unjust decisions, thereby denying the poor men their right of trial by jury and permitting industrial highbinders to exploit the wage-workers.

I have had a wide acquaintance with the lawyers, and among them I have some very good friends, and in my opinion they are very generally high-minded and public-spirited citizens. I regret that about all the opposition to the initiative and referendum and recall comes from the legal fraternity. The corporation lawyers, it seems, almost without exception, are opposed to these reforms, and especially to the recall of judges, which will cause further doubt of their sincerity of purpose and further strengthen the opinion that is now prevalent among the people that they have drawn their convictions from the same place that they have their emoluments.

The gentlemen here who have so fluently opposed the initiative, referendum, and recall have spent much of their time in the defense and commendation of judges and in telling us about the danger of the mob (people), but have been conspicuously silent in their praises of the people, who, in the end, will be the final and supreme judge of the conduct of all public men. The people will never permit themselves to be misled into giving up that right that our Revolutionary fathers fought and bled for—the right of self-government. Plutocracy has the most brilliant and intellectual agents that money can buy. They speak of Cæsar, Demosthenes, Plato, and Aristides. They quote from orators, philosophers, logicians, and statesmen; they read from the Bible, and legends of old. They describe the beauties of the flag and how it unfurls its folds in the breezes. They take their chances at deluding the people with flowery oratory and words of praise, which for so long a time has characterized their deceit; but to them I give a word of warning. I remind them that the people have borne their loss in the past and have been good and courageous losers. But now, sirs, they are fighting with the ballots of the many against the capital of the select few, and you will find yourselves, on the eve of what you had hoped would be your victory, crushed by the will of the masses, and once more that which you would claim your own will revert to its rightful owner, and the people will have triumphed.

I am in favor of this joint resolution to admit Arizona and New Mexico into the Union as States, and congratulate the people of Arizona in reserving to the electorate the power of recall to all elective officers, including the judges.

A good, honest judge, who exercises his functions efficiently and conscientiously, need not fear the recall. Such a judge can not remain too long on the bench. A month, however, is too long a term for an inefficient, dishonest judge; and for this reason the recall should not only apply to elective judges, but to the Federal judges who are appointed also.

The judges appointed by the President to the bench are usually attorneys of great ability. Their ability has generally resulted in their employment, sometime in their career, by special privileged corporations, which are able to pay the highest prices for legal service. The minds of such men tend to become warped in favor of special privileges, which they formerly represented. Elevation to the bench does not free them of their prejudice, and if their prejudices should prevent them from rendering justice to the public, the electorate should have the right to recall them.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, at the end of section 4 of the proposed article 19, in line 19, add the following:

"SEC. 5. The provisions of section 1 of this article shall not be changed, altered, or abrogated in any manner, except through a general convention called to revise this constitution as herein provided."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered is the identical section 5 of article 19 of the constitution of New Mexico on amendments. That section provides that section 1 of article 19, which provides the method of submitting and ratifying amendments, shall only be amended through the medium of a constitutional convention, as provided for in section 2. At first blush the committee did not think it fair, in case the people of New Mexico should adopt the substitute submitted to them, to tie that section up in the manner in which it was tied up in this article, but subsequent reflection has developed the fact that that is the only method by which we can safeguard the special provisions as to ratification provided in the articles on education and elective franchise. In other words, unless we insert section 5 of the article on amendments as it stands in the New Mexico constitution, if our substitute should be adopted, the first New Mexico Legislature could submit an amendment to section 1 of article 19 eliminating or dropping the proviso which carries the safeguards on education and elective franchise, and that amendment could be adopted by a majority of the people voting thereon. It is therefore necessary, in order to safeguard the proviso and those sections of the articles on education and elective franchise as now provided for in the constitution, to continue this section 5, and that is the purpose of the amendment and the end that will be effected by it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute, page 3, line 6, by striking out all of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of New Mexico, elected in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress entitled 'An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and so forth,' approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which said constitutional convention met at Santa Fe, N. Mex., on the 3d day of October, A. D. 1910, and adjourned November 21, A. D. 1910, and which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified electors of the Territory of New Mexico, at an election held according to law on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1911, being republican in form, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and complying with the terms of said enabling act, be, and the same is hereby, approved, subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution reaffirming the boundary line between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico,' approved on the 16th day of February, A. D. 1911."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered is to approve the constitution of New Mexico adopted by the constitutional convention of that Territory. If that amendment be agreed to and be enacted into law, the result is to at once make New Mexico a State without further proceedings on the part of Congress. The enabling act provided that either of these Territories should be admitted if the constitution to be adopted should be approved by the President and by Congress, or, for that matter, if it should be approved by the President and not disapproved by Congress at the next regular session. The proposition offered by the majority in their substitute resolution is to admit New Mexico when and after she has voted upon an amendment to her constitution. In one breath they say that we have no moral right to say what shall be in the constitution of these Territories, and in the next breath they refuse to accept the constitution which has already been adopted by New Mexico. If the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle in good faith believe that Congress ought not to scan the constitution of a proposed State except that it be republican in form, then there is nothing left for them to do but to approve the constitution as New Mexico has adopted it and let the Territory into the Union as a State. [Applause on the Republican side.] This same resolution was the resolution first introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the chairman of the Committee on the Territories. It is the same resolution which passed unanimously in the closing days of the last session of Congress.

Mr. COX of Indiana. But the House was so busy it could not consider it.

Mr. MANN. The House was not so busy but it gave consideration and debate to this proposition, led on that side of the House by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], and it received the approval of both Democrats and Republicans in this House. If we have no jurisdiction, as claimed by my friends on the left side of the aisle here, except to say that the constitution is republican in form, then let us say it, because we on this side of the aisle are prepared now, without further delay, to admit New Mexico as a State into the Union. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not think it is necessary in order to determine whether we admit these two States that you determine what their politics is or will be. I am willing to vote in reference to the admission of a Territory as a State when it has reached the point where it is entitled to have consideration, regardless of its politics or its partisanship or its future political representation, either in this body or in the body at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause.] And you gentlemen who refuse to vote to admit New Mexico now by approving the constitution, I do not think show the best of faith in the matter. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois presents the issue between the majority and the minority of the Committee on Territories. It seems to me that it does not come with good grace from the gentleman from Illinois to criticize this side of the House for offering some condition for the admission of New Mexico, when he only a few moments ago offered a resolution as a condition for the admission of Arizona which not only said to the people of Arizona, "You must vote on an amendment to your constitution, but you must vote as we say you shall vote."

Now, the proposition of the majority is to allow the people of New Mexico to vote upon an amendment to their constitution. It has been represented to that committee, as I said a little while ago, by every shade of political thought in that Territory, except the stand-pat Republicans and the corporate interests there, that this constitution was framed up in the interests of the corporations of New Mexico, and this article on amendment was fixed so it would be impossible for a majority, even for three-fourths or four-fifths of the people of this proposed State, for years to come to amend it. They have asked that no condition be imposed upon the admission of this new State, except the people are permitted to vote upon an amendment to the article on amendments. Regardless of how they vote they come in. It does not delay them, and they are free to vote as they please, and not as the gentleman from Illinois would treat Arizona—require her people to vote a particular way. This represents the views, Mr. Chairman, of the people of New Mexico, as opposed to the corporate interests of New Mexico, and I hope this committee will vote this amendment down. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 117.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MANN and Mr. FLOOD of Virginia took their place as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 141.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if, in line 17, on page 5 of the resolution, the committee does not mean to say "not more than two weeks" instead of "not less than two weeks"? Under the resolution as it now reads the last printing could be six months prior to the election.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The last publication must be not less than two weeks before the election.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not less than two weeks prior to the election; you want it "not more than two weeks"?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Not less than two weeks.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There will be no harm if you bring it within two weeks, but under your provision here, if the last publication was six weeks prior to the election it would still be permissible under the act. You do not want it less than two weeks prior to the election?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No.

Mr. SAUNDERS. You want it not more than two weeks prior to the election?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think the gentleman from Virginia is right about that, Mr. Chairman. Therefore I move to strike out the word "less" and insert the word "more."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 5, line 17, strike out the word "less" and insert the word "more."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs to the adoption of the substitute as amended.

The question was taken, and the substitute as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The title to the resolution has to be changed, and would it be proper to offer the amendment in committee or in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The title would be changed after the engrossment and third reading of the resolution, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It will be done after we get into the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; under the rules.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution to the House with the several amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 14, approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments thereto, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Shall the joint resolution as amended be engrossed and read the third time?

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN moved to recommit the resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to the Committee on the Territories, with instructions to report said resolution forthwith back to the House, with the following amendment, to wit:

Strike out all of said resolution after the word "that" in the first line of the resolution after the resolving clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The constitution formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of New Mexico, elected in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress entitled 'An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and so forth,' approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which said constitutional convention met at Santa Fe, N. Mex., on the 3d day of October, A. D. 1910, and adjourned November 21, A. D. 1910, and which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified electors of the Territory of New Mexico, at an election held according to law on the 21st day of January, A. D. 1911, being republican in form, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and complying with the terms of said enabling act, be, and the same is hereby, approved, subject to the terms and conditions of the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution reaffirming the boundary line between Texas and the Territory of New Mexico,' approved on the 16th day of February, A. D. 1911.

"SEC. 2. That the Territory of Arizona be admitted into this Union as a State with the constitution which was formed by the constitutional convention of the Territory of Arizona, elected in accordance with the terms of the enabling act, approved June 20, A. D. 1910, which constitution was subsequently ratified and adopted by the duly qualified voters of the Territory of Arizona at an election held according to law on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1911, upon the fundamental condition, however, that article 8 of the said constitution of Arizona, in so far as it relates to the 'recall of public officers,' shall be held and construed not to apply to judicial officers, and that the people of Arizona shall give their assent to such construction of article 8 of the said constitution.

"That within 30 days after the passage of this resolution and its approval by the President, the President shall certify the fact to the governor of Arizona, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of such certificate from the President, issue his proclamation for an election by the qualified voters of Arizona, to be held not earlier than 60 nor later than 90 days thereafter, at which election the qualified voters of Arizona shall vote upon the proposition that 'article 8 of the constitution, in so far as it relates to "recall of public officers," shall be held and construed not to apply to judicial officers,' and shall also vote for State and county officers, members of the State legislature, and Representatives in Congress, and all other officers provided for in said constitution of Arizona; said election to be held and the returns thereof made, canvassed, and certified as provided in section 23 of the enabling act approved June 20, 1910.

"If a majority of the qualified voters of Arizona voting at such election ratify and adopt the herein proposed construction of article 8 of the constitution, the same shall be and become a part of the said constitution, and said article 8 of said constitution, in so far as it relates to the 'recall of public officers,' shall have like effect as if judicial officers were expressly excepted therefrom.

"If the proposed construction of said article 8 of the constitution is duly ratified and adopted by the qualified voters of Arizona, the election of officers at the same election shall be and become valid and effective.

"When said election as to the proposed construction of the said constitution and of State and county officers, members of the legislature and Representatives in Congress, and other officers provided for in said constitution has been held, the result thereof shall at once be certified by the governor of the Territory of Arizona to the President of the United States, and if the proposed construction of article 8 of the said constitution of Arizona has been ratified and adopted by a majority of the qualified voters of Arizona voting at such election, the President of the United States shall immediately make proclamation thereof and of the result of the election of officers, and upon the issuance of said proclamation by the President of the United States, Arizona shall, without other proceeding, be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union by virtue of this joint resolution, upon the terms and conditions of the said enabling act approved June 20, 1910, except as modified herein, and on an equal footing with the other States."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether anyone desires to have that read through. It is a combination of the two amendments which I offered in the Committee of the Whole. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the full reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the full reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Too late. [Laughter.] The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 58, nays 215, answered "present" 10, not voting 99, as follows:

Mr. PALMER (against recommitment) with Mr. DE FOREST (in favor).

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I ask permission to withdraw my vote and to vote "present," as I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], who did not vote.

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRADLEY], and so I vote "present."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," but I notice that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] did not vote at all. I have a general pair with him, and therefore I withdraw my vote and vote "present."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye" on this roll call, but I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and I desire to withdraw my vote and to answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall House joint resolution 14 pass?

The question being taken, the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title. I send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the title, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so that it will read "Joint resolution to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

To Mr. ADAMSON, for one week, on account of official business.

To Mr. HANNA, until further notice, on account of illness.

To Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, for 10 days, on account of important business.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1911.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker House of Representatives.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, to take effect at the pleasure of the Speaker.

CHARLES F. BOOHER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what has become of the request for the leaves of absence?

The SPEAKER. They have been granted.

Mr. MANN. Does that include the resignation from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and does that take effect now?

The SPEAKER. It takes effect now.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Friday next.

The motion was considered and agreed to.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ALLEN OF MAINE.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the following order be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That there be a session of the House on Sunday, June 11, at 12 m., and that the said session be devoted to eulogies on the life, character, and public services of AMOS L. ALLEN, late a Representative from the State of Maine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all who spoke on the statehood bill be allowed to extend remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. For five days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all those who made remarks on the statehood bill have five days to extend remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he thinks anyone who spoke on the subject except myself did not get leave to extend remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. One or two gentlemen have asked me to make the request, and I did not suppose they had got leave.

Mr. MANN. There were 15 or 20 who did, but I shall make no opposition unless I find that the privilege is abused in a way to which I expect later to call to the attention of the House by inserting in their remarks "Loud and tumultuous applause," "Prolonged applause," "Loud laughter and applause," all of which never took place. That I shall call to the attention of the House later.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Friday, May 26, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 24, 1911.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by Rev. John Van Schaick, of the city of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the clerk of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, transmitting a resolution passed by that body favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 18, 1911.

Whereas there is an earnest, general, and widespread demand that United States Senators be elected by the direct majority vote of the electors of the several States; and

Whereas the desire of the citizens for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States securing to them this right has been manifested in various ways in a large majority of the said States, including the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; and

Whereas a resolution proposing such an amendment for submission to the several States has recently been adopted by the lower branch of the present Congress and is now under consideration in the Senate: Therefore be it

Voted, That the House of Representatives of the General Court of Massachusetts favors the proposal of this amendment to the States by Congress, and respectfully urges upon the Senators from Massachusetts in the Congress of the United States the favorable consideration of the resolution now pending, that the people shall have secured to them the right to vote directly for United States Senators.

Voted, That a copy of this vote be sent by the clerk to each of the Senators from Massachusetts in the Congress of the United States and to the President of the Senate of the United States.

JAMES W. KIMBALL, Clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Sunday School of the South Congregational Church, of New Britain, Conn., and a petition of the congregation of the Church of the Brethren of Beaver Creek, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict the sale of and traffic in opium, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2316) fixing the rank and precedence of naval attachés, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 43) thereon.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 817. A bill appropriating $25,000 for the repair of the wooden warship Portsmouth (Rept. No. 40); and

S. 291. A bill providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy or Marine Corps, and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel (Rept. No. 39).

Mr. THORNTON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1724) to amend section 14 of "An act to promote the administration of justice in the Navy," approved February 16, 1909, and to provide for the destruction of records of deck courts in the United States Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 41) thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2004) to amend section 1505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the suspension from promotion of officers of the Navy if not professionally qualified, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 42) thereon.

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1774) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to erect a suitable monument over the remains of Rear Admiral Charles Wilkes, United States Navy, in the national cemetery at Arlington, Va., asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library, which was agreed to.

JAMES HENRY PAYNE.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 287) for the relief of James Henry Payne, and I submit a report (No. 37) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to place upon the retired list of the United States Navy, with the rank of passed assistant surgeon, with three-fourths the pay of that grade, the name of James Henry Payne, late passed assistant surgeon of the United States Navy. But James Henry Payne shall not, by the passage of this act, be entitled to back pay or allowances.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENSIGN JOHN TRACEY EDSON.

Mr. LODGE. From the same committee I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 288) to authorize the President to place Ensign John Tracey Edson on the retired list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant, and I submit a report (No. 38) thereon. I make the same request in regard to this bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the President to appoint late Ensign John Tracey Edson a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States and then place his name on the 75 per cent pay list of retired officers, under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let this bill likewise go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

IRVING STREET, CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 307) to change the name of Fort Place, from Seventeenth to Eighteenth Streets NE., to Irving Street was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDAY-REST LAW.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. On whose objection does the bill go over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It goes over on the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Does the Senator from Utah wish to put over the consideration of the bill now?

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think we have time under the five-minute rule to consider it, and I would very much appreciate it if the Senator would allow the bill to go over for a few days. I have received a number of letters on the subject, and I have not had time to read them.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The bill will go over, but I intend to insist on a vote upon this measure.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no intention whatever to prevent a vote from being had upon it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It is a bill for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest, and I give notice that I shall call it up and insist upon a vote on the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator and to the Senate that I have no desire whatever to prevent a vote on the bill. The only reason why I have asked that it should go over is because my secretary handed me a number of letters this morning and I did not have time to go over them. They are all upon the subject of this bill. I simply ask that the bill may go over until I can read the letters; that is all.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is all right; I have no objection to the bill going over to-day; but I wish to say that those opposing the bill have had a full hearing before the committee and every consideration has been given to them.

Mr. GALLINGER. While the title of the bill is doubtless right, so far as the bill itself is concerned, on the calendar it reads a bill for "the proper observation" instead of "the proper observance." I suggest to the clerks that that be corrected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The correction will be made.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE.

The bill (S. 274) providing for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it seems to me that a little different rule is applied to the individuals from that applied to both the corporation itself and the United States; but that, in the very nature of things, is to be expected. Yet it appears to me that inasmuch as there are known to be a great many nonresident property owners within the District, there ought to be some notice sent to them where the snow and ice have been removed from the sidewalks abutting their property before the corporation counsel can institute proceedings to recover the amount certified by the city authorities.

Under the provisions of the bill, it seems to me that a nonresident property owner might have proceedings instituted against his property and have it sold without ever having any notice, either through the possible neglect of the agent or in a case where the property happens to be vacant. It appears to me that some provision ought to be made in the bill for notice to the property owner before these proceedings can be instituted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Oregon is obviated by the provisions of the District Code. No provision was incorporated in this bill beyond one that the corporation counsel might be directed to authorize a suit for recovery. Of course, if he does that, he will do it under the provisions of the Code of the District of Columbia. So that class of nonresidents will stand upon the same basis as other nonresidents against whom suits have to be brought.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask if the Senator from Vermont knows what the provision is with respect to notice provided by the code in other cases.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I recognize the force of the Senator's objection, but I think it is provided for by the code.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the calendar.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 39.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, while, speaking in a parliamentary sense, an amendment is before the Senate, yet it is impossible to segregate the original joint resolution from the amendment which is intended to change or limit its application. The Senate of the United States is on trial this morning as to its capacity and fidelity as a representative of the people of the country.

The first question to be considered is, Shall we amend the Constitution at all, and primarily is there a necessity for its amendment? Is this merely a hue and cry for change or is it a proposition to amend the Constitution because it has been found wanting as a fundamental rule of law to insure a representative government of the people? It can not or certainly will not be claimed in this body that the members of it and every member of it is not here by virtue of regular proceedings had in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution. That being answered in the affirmative, the next question is, Has there been a failure to realize the purpose which the founders had in organizing this branch of the Government—a failure to procure an efficient, competent representation of the political subdivisions of the Government intended to be represented in this body? It was intended that the States should be represented as parts of the Government, each equal to the other in right, and each requiring the same character of representation as the other in relation to the affairs of the States as parts of the Government. The States existed before the Constitution was adopted. They existed just as firmly and stood upon just as high a plane before the Constitution was adopted as afterwards; but the States had more power before the adoption of the Constitution than they possessed after its adoption.

The Constitution is a limitation upon the power of the States. One part of the subject under consideration is directed to the enlargement of the power of the States, or rather to a release to the States of a part of the power which they surrendered by the Constitution. The other part is directed in exactly the opposite direction. The joint resolution proposed by the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] proposes to change the manner of selecting Senators, and it also proposes to change the power of the Senators after they are elected.

The proposition to amend section 4 of Article I can not be applied in a practical way. You leave a skeleton of paragraph 1 of section 4; you leave a skeleton of that section unaffected by these amendments. You substitute one amendment for the provisions now contained in three separate and distinct parts of the Constitution. Nothing is proposed to be done in regard to that portion of section 4, in line 2, which is represented by the words "and Representatives." What will be the status of those words with that section amended, as is proposed by the joint resolution offered by the junior Senator from Idaho? You will have eliminated from it everything except the provision relative to the right of Congress to provide for the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators; that you eliminate; and the following words, "and Representatives," you deal with not at all. Will Congress still have the power to make regulations affecting the election of Members of the House of Representatives? No attempt is made to dispose of that language in section 4, and no proposition is made to repeal section 4 in this joint resolution. You provide in an independent section proposed to be incorporated into the Constitution language as to the regulation of the election of Senators and make no provision as to the power of Congress to regulate the election of Members of the House of Representatives. I am speaking now to the provisions that must be rearranged and must be considered before we can vote upon this measure, and I am now speaking as to the legal effect of this proposed amendment.

The proposition contained in the joint resolution is this:

And in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators—

Then it jumps over the words in the Constitution "and Representatives"— the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution.

No amendment separate and distinct is proposed in the joint resolution.

Now we come to the provision itself as suggested, and we find it reading thus:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

There is no provision that section 4, Article I of the Constitution, as it now exists shall be repealed; only that a part of it be changed, without a suggestion as to what shall be done with the remainder of it. I appeal to the lawyers of this body and to all Members of it as to whether or not that is a complete disposition of section 4, Article I. Will not that part of section 4 which relates to the control of elections affecting Members of the House of Representatives remain? I should be glad to hear from some Senator who is supporting this measure in regard to that question. Will it leave standing as a part of the Constitution of the United States the provision authorizing Congress to make regulations governing the election of Members of the House of Representatives? If it does, then section 4, Article I, of the Constitution must be redrawn; otherwise we will have inconsistent provisions.

That is all there is in this proposed amendment with relation to section 4 of Article I.

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

And that is confined to Senators. Shall it be in each State as prescribed by the legislature in regard to Members of the House of Representatives? Suppose you send this proposed amendment out to the legislatures of the country for ratification; there will be no legislature in the United States lacking the intelligence and the legal ability to recognize the imperfection of the amendment submitted. It is not provided that section 4, Article I, shall be amended, mind you; it is not provided that any part of section 4 shall remain in the Constitution. It provides for the creation of a new section in the Constitution that will stand separate and apart from any other section in the Constitution. That being true, you will have inconsistent provisions in the Constitution; you will have this new section with these words confined entirely to the election of Senators standing as a section of the Constitution—a new section, because the joint resolution provides that it shall be a new section. It does not provide that it shall be incorporated into any section existing. It provides for the creation of a new section and leaves a mutilated section stand without any provision being made therefor.

If I am incorrect in that, I shall be glad to have some member of the committee show wherein I am incorrect. Would you send a proposed amendment to the legislatures in that form? They can do nothing with it; they can not change a word or a phrase or a punctuation mark in it; they will either adopt it or reject it, and they can reject it upon the ground that it is not sufficiently explicit, that it does not properly safeguard the provisions of the Constitution outside of the proposed new section. They may reject it on that ground and on no other, and you would not get the benefit of the judgment of the legislatures of the several States upon the merits of this question. It is not a small matter for consideration; it is one that may affect this entire proposed legislation and its results.

That is aside from the merits of the proposition of amending the Constitution; that goes to the question as to the sufficiency of the joint resolution that is to present to the legislatures this question. Does any Senator desire that the States shall pass upon it upon those grounds without considering the principle sought to be reviewed. I call the attention—I see that the author of the joint resolution is not present, but evidently he expects to be present——

Mr. NELSON. A call of the Senate might bring him.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I will not call the Senate; the Senate is here.

I challenge any Member who is responsible for the joint resolution, or who participated in its consideration in the committee, or who is going to vote for it, to defend that proposition as to the insufficiency, from a legal standpoint, of this proposed amendment to the Constitution. Of course, this is squarely involved in the consideration of the amendment to the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I should like to know whether or not any lawyer of the Senate wants to send his reputation out with that tag on it. If he does, he is welcome, so far as I am concerned, to do so. You will find that the country and those who are competent to analyze and pass upon such questions will hold you to account for it in the legislatures to which it is submitted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am a member of the committee that reported the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am aware of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not the author of the joint resolution, and it is quite probable that I will vote for the substitute proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]; but, nevertheless, I can not allow the broad and unqualified statements of the senior Senator from Idaho to pass unchallenged, simply as a lawyer. If the Senator from Idaho were content to criticize the composition of the joint resolution as compared with some other form——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not.

Mr. CUMMINS. To accomplish the same object I would not have a word to say; but when the Senator from Idaho insists that the joint resolution is not effective, that the Constitution of the United States would not be amended to accomplish the object we have in view if the proposed amendment receive the assent of the proper number of States, I can not concur with him.

I rose because the junior Senator from Idaho was not present, but I call the attention of the senior Senator from Idaho to what he has already read in the hearing of the Senate for further reflection. It declares that section 4—I will have to give it from the beginning in order to make the connection clear—

That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and in lieu of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said article, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution.

If the joint resolution which the Senator is now considering becomes a part of the Constitution, while it does not rewrite section 4, it does repeal, if I may use the word "repeal" in connection with the Constitution, all that part of section 4 which relates to the authority of Congress to prescribe regulations or alter regulations relating to the time and the manner of electing Senators of the United States. It leaves in full force and effect all of section 4 so far as it relates to prescribing either rules or regulations or altering regulations relating to the election of Members of the House of Representatives. It has precisely the same effect as though we were to pass a law inconsistent with some former law and declare that the former statute, in so far as it was repugnant or inconsistent with the one then being passed, should be repealed.

Mr. HEYBURN. The trouble in this case is that you have not done that.

Mr. CUMMINS. After listening very carefully to the argument of the senior Senator from Idaho I can not see the justice of his conclusion. I can readily see that he might prefer, even if he were trying to accomplish this same object, to rewrite section 4, preserving it just as it will be preserved in law after the passage of this amendment.

But the senior Senator from Idaho certainly can not insist that if this joint resolution in its present form becomes a part of the Constitution of the United States there will be any doubt whatsoever that all the power that Congress now has relating to rules and regulations respecting the election of the Members of the House of Representatives remains just as it is, and that Congress will have no power whatsoever with regard to regulations respecting the elections of Senators of the United States, but that that subject is entirely provided for in the part which the Senator from Idaho has already read, namely:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. And will the Senator from Idaho allow me——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Allow me to call attention to the difference in the phraseology of section 4 as found in the Constitution and this substitute in the joint resolution. The language of section 4 is:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

It is mandatory; while in this paragraph here the language is as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed by the legislatures thereof.

They may prescribe them or not, just as they see fit.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was coming to that. That is another subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota is now passing from the construction or interpretation of what is proposed to the merits of the proposal.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him a question here.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not saying anything about the merits of the proposal. I am simply differing with the senior Senator from Idaho in regard to the effect of the amendment if it does become a part of the organic law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to request him to state how section 4 of Article I of the Constitution would read after the adoption of this proposed amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no attempt to rewrite section 4.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, how would it read?

Mr. CUMMINS. And nominally section 4 of Article I would remain in the Constitution, I assume, precisely as it is now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Nominally?

Mr. CUMMINS. But a subsequent amendment or a subsequent part of the Constitution takes from section 4 all operativeness with regard to the election of Senators, leaving it precisely as it is with respect to the election of Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, then, would the proposed section be a new one or be incorporated into section 4?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would make no difference, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, what would it do?

Mr. CUMMINS. How it was numbered.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it does make a difference——

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. How sections are numbered in the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I take it it does not make any difference how sections are numbered in the Constitution. It would be a part of the Constitution. It would be adopted after section 4 had been adopted, and would therefore qualify section 4.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me ask the Senator. In a reprint of the Constitution after the adoption of this amendment, would section 4 read as it does now and then an additional explanatory or curtailing section be incorporated into it as a new section?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion section 4, on a reprint of the Constitution, would read exactly as it now reads, and the proposed amendment would take its place physically in some other part of the Constitution; but the amendment would nevertheless qualify in the manner I have described section 4.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would relate back to it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would be printed as the amendments are now printed—far from section 4 as it appears in the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know how it would be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not material to know how the Constitution would be written?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it is in the least material as to where it finds a place physically in the print of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I now understand the Senator's position, and I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. BORAH. I was only going to suggest that the amendment would undoubtedly be printed as the other amendments to the Constitution are printed, following the amendments which now exist, and this amendment would modify any original provision of the Constitution to the effect of the language found in the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I take it the author of the joint resolution right there——

Mr. BORAH. I want to say, however, that in view of the anxiety of my colleague to have this just exactly right, I shall be glad to have his assistance in rewriting any of it in order to get it exactly right.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will call my colleague's attention to the fact that it says in lieu of section 4.

Mr. BORAH. And so much thereof——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is expressed in the amendment. It says in lieu of it. Then why not take out section 4? Of course the word "repeal" is not a proper term to use. Why not eliminate section 4, as it applies to this question?

Mr. BORAH. It says:

In lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have read that.

Mr. BORAH. But not as to Representatives. It does not say in lieu of section 4, but it says in lieu of a certain part of section 4.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And my colleague ought at least to state the matter fairly when he is criticizing his colleague.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I am stating it fairly. I am endeavoring to. I am objecting to an amendment of the Constitution by reference to a part of a section without in any manner disposing of the remaining part of the section. The language would be entirely inappropriate; that is, the remaining language, unaffected by this amendment, would be inappropriate as section 4. Why not say "in lieu of section 4," and then repeat the section as it is to be amended entirely? That is the orderly way in which to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Of course it is very difficult to draw a resolution which is satisfactory to those who are opposed to the resolution in any form. It is not so difficult to draw it for those who are in favor of some amendment, but it is very difficult to draw it for those who are opposed to any amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very correct statement of a certain code of morals, and I have no objection to it. I prefer that every law or every provision of the Constitution of the United States, if it is to become a part of our law, shall be correctly and properly and unambiguously stated. Why was it not proper to say that in lieu of section 4 there is hereby adopted a section 4 in the following language, or as follows? It is not in lieu of it. Why leave a part of the section—a ragged section? Why not recite the whole section as it is intended to read when it is adopted, so that when you look at it you will know what the provision is without referring or without the analysis that would be in some cases necessary to determine just exactly what effect it had on the original provision?

Mr. BORAH. The view of the minority of the committee, signed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], asserts that this amendment does precisely what it purports to do, and makes this particular and specific change in the Constitution. I feel quite sure that if those Senators could be convinced that it does not make the change, they would feel that they would like to withdraw their minority views.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not appear before the minority of that committee or the majority of the committee, and the minority views do not express my views, and it is not a majority of this court, and I say that in all respect. We have passed beyond the tribunal of majority and minority on the committee into the court of last resort, and we are here to review and discuss the report of both the majority and the minority, being a body empowered to overrule both of them if necessary.

If I were in favor of this, I would not support it in this form. I would insist that section 4 should be drawn as a whole, to represent both that which was to be stricken out and that which was to remain in, in the interest of proper legislation; and I think that the members of the committee, on reflection, will be induced to change the form both of the preamble and of the amendment to be submitted.

Now, Mr. President, I warn them that if they go before the legislatures of the several States and submit this to the judgment of lawyers in those bodies they will meet with that objection, and I hope with that objection and other valid objections they will meet with defeat. So much for that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just for a question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that the objection of the Senator from Idaho to both the majority and minority report, as stated by the Senator from Idaho, is that if either be adopted by the legislatures of the various States we will have in the Constitution an inconsistent expression upon one and the same subject matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the fundamental objection which the Senator from Idaho makes.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the basis of it; and I think, upon reflection, the members of the committee may see some justification for my objection.

Now I come to the proposed amendment of section 3, which is practically adopted by the minority report and which is the amendment under consideration at this time, as presented by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIPPITT in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I call the attention of my colleague to amendment 12 of the Constitution. It was an amendment of Article II. All of Article II yet remains physically in the Constitution, but it is modified by amendment 12, which is published further along in the Constitution. So far as I have ever been able to learn, there has never been any difficulty in construing Article II in connection with the twelfth amendment of the Constitution. That is precisely what has taken place here.

Mr. HEYBURN. The twelfth amendment of the Constitution was additional matter, and the subject matter was not included in existing provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. But the fact is that Article II was not rewritten. A portion of Article II was permitted to remain and there were additions and distinctions made with reference thereto in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution. So you have precisely the same rule of amendment that we have adopted here. They might have rewritten Article II entirely or they might have pursued the course which they did pursue, either one being effectual to accomplish the purpose of those seeking the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, an inspection and a comparison of the language of section 2 of Article I with the twelfth amendment will not bear out the conclusion of the junior Senator. It is more in line with the principle which I am invoking. If there is any instrument on earth that ought to be so definite, unambiguous, and certain that there would be no necessity for an analytical construction as to its meaning, it is the Constitution of the United States. There should be no amendment by reference whatever; the amendment should be by a specific statement of the provision to be incorporated in it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I call the attention of the Senator to what is regarded as a well-settled rule of construction both of statutory law and of the organic law?—

> Amendments to constitutions or statutes are not regarded as if they had been parts of the original instruments, but are considered rather in the nature of codicils or second instruments, altering or rescinding the originals to the extent to which they are in conflict, and, of course, are to be treated as having a force superior to the originals to the extent of such conflict. If a constitutional amendment does not in terms expressly repeal a constitutional provision, yet if it covers the same subject provided for in such provision, the amendment will be regarded as a substitute for it and as suspending it.

That would be the principle to be applied to this proposed amendment, even if the phraseology were not as exact as it is in distinctly stating that in lieu of these various features of the first and second paragraphs and the fourth paragraph of Article I the following is to be taken as a substitute.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator as to the rule of construction. Where ambiguities are discovered in the application of amendments to either a law or the Constitution the court must find a way out of it so as to preserve the principle if possible. But we are here initiating provisions; we are here for original action; and it is our first duty to avoid the necessity of doing just those things to which the Senator from New York has called our attention.

I am not arguing that if we were to adopt this amendment as it is a court would not search, under the rule invoked by the Senator from New York, for the means of sustaining the provision; but I am discussing the question as to whether or not this is a proper way, in an original action, to proceed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not seek to vindicate the phraseology employed, but I do express the opinion that it will carry out the purpose of those who designed the proposed amendment. I do not dispute that the language employed might be more specific and that perhaps a more appropriate amendment might be the means of effectuating the common purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am discussing now the proper way to do it. I am not maintaining that no other method might accomplish the purpose, but I am discussing the propriety of the method proposed, as to whether or not it is the best and the proper method; and it was to that proposition that I directed my criticism. It may be that any thought can be expressed in more than one phrase or character of phrases and yet by interpretation it may reach its ultimate purpose; but the question is, Can we not and should we not adopt a more direct method of amending section 4, if it is to be amended? That is to say, we can eliminate the future necessity of reference to a condition that existed before our action by acting directly ourselves, and it is a question of the propriety of doing it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from Idaho mean that where the joint resolution says on the first page, for instance:

> In lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations—

And so forth—

> the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution—

and whereas the following on page 2 appears to be four separate paragraphs, relating to several different features of the Constitution, by the language used practically those four paragraphs on page 2 are substituted in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4? Does the Senator intend to convey that idea?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; that is a question yet to be entered upon. I had not reached the point as to the propriety of incorporating isolated parts of the Constitution into sections without number and calling it one amendment. I will reach that in a minute. The suggestion of the Senator from New York as to how this should be done is one that I will first give attention to.

If I were drawing this proposed amendment, I would say "of section 4 of Article I the following is proposed as an amendment," and then I would recite, as amended, the whole section. I would not leave out the provision in that section relative to the election of Members of the House. Why should you? Why should you not, in order to avoid the necessity of reference and construction, state the section as it is to be remolded, including the provision in regard to the election of Members of the House? Why the necessity of limiting the amendment to a part of the section when you could as well say that the section shall read as follows, and leave it stand as section 4 of Article I of the Constitution? That is the rule when rightly applied in legislation, and why not apply it in amending the Constitution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to come to that question, but I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. HEYBURN. I like to be interrupted. It does not interrupt me a bit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to see if I could make myself a little clearer and perhaps say something in addition to what I said before in relation to the same subject.

It seems to me that the language of the proposed joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) on the first page, on a careful reading, is somewhat unfortunately worded. I admit that, because it proceeds to say that "in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I," in so far as it relates to another subject. Apparently the language of all those separate paragraphs and sections would be amended, if this language is to be literally construed, by inserting all that appears on page 2 pertaining to all these several matters. Of course that would be an absurdity, and that is not the intention, I assume, of the proposers. Yet that, as I read it, is what the joint resolution literally proposes to do; and the Senator from New York proposes a rule of construction, as I understand it, by which he thinks that absurd interpretation could not be sustained.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Connecticut expresses the objection I was going to urge to the attempt to incorporate as a single amendment to the Constitution corrections of three separate and distinct paragraphs of the Constitution. A constitution should be amended in the most specific and direct manner. It is entirely competent and entirely within the rule of legislation of this or any other kind to take each of those paragraphs and propose a substitute for it as a separate amendment. As was said yesterday, and as I said in opening this morning, you have incorporated three amendments, or the amendment of three different parts of the Constitution, in one amendment, and they are not directed to the same purpose or the same political principle. Of course an amendment to the Constitution is the purest kind of politics. It is politics as politics should be; it is the science of government.

The science of our Government is written in the Constitution, and it is politics and should be regarded as such. I have always contended against the application of the term "politics" to political jugglery. It means nothing of the kind when I use it. It was not intended to be so used at any time by those who speak responsibly.

We are now dealing with a political principle of government. First, shall the manner of electing Senators be changed? That is a distinct, separate principle and can stand out alone. Second, shall the power of the Government over the States be changed? That has nothing whatever to do with the election of Senators. One must precede the other. Until Senators are elected there is no part of the Government possessing the functions to perform the other thing sought to be changed.

Before I take up the question of the merits of the proposed change in section 4, I want to discuss the question as to the change of the manner of electing Senators. I said upon first addressing the Chair that the Senate of the United States from the foundation up to the present day is on trial, because the purpose of this legislation and the constitutional provisions is to secure the performance of the will and the carrying out of the principles of the Government.

No Senator will claim that the standard of the men who have constituted the Senate of the United States has been below the high character that it was intended they should possess. No Senator will maintain that either on his own account or on the account of his associates. Since the Senate was founded there have been elected to it up to last year eleven hundred and eighty-odd persons, and that does not include reelections. That many individuals have been selected by legislatures of the States and they have served in this body and they have been responsible for the laws that have been enacted and the manner of their administration. Are we in considering this proposed amendment to challenge the capacity, the honor, or the integrity of those men?

I am looking now for a reason for a change proposed to be made in the Constitution. If there is no reason for it I do not believe that any Senator would for a moment consider it or support it. Where is the reason? We will pass the question as settled definitely that it is not to be found in the personnel of those who have been elected. Is it to be found in their acts in this body? Have they shown a lower scale of judgment or integrity than it is to be presumed will be found in those selected in some other way? I think we would not admit that. We would not challenge the ability or the high character of the Senators of the past. Then why change it? Whence comes this demand, if it is a demand? Is it from selfish interests? Is it from any place that we should respect?

Mr. President, I would suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	Lodge	Reed
Bailey	Davis	McCumber	Root
Borah	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shively
Bourne	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Brandegee	Gallinger	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gamble	Nelson	Smoot
Burnham	Gore	Newlands	Stone
Burton	Gronna	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Guggenheim	Oliver	Swanson
Chilton	Heyburn	Overman	Terrell
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Thornton
Clarke, Ark.	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Townsend
Crane	Jones	Percy	Watson
Crawford	Kern	Perkins	Wetmore
Cullom	Lea	Pomerene	Williams
Cummins	Lippitt	Rayner	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names, and there is a quorum present. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was inquiring as to whether or not there was a demand for this change in the Constitution; and if so, where did it come from and how has it been expressed. It is easy enough to say that the people are demanding this, and to make that a ground for action; but the people are not demanding, nor have they at any time demanded, this action on the part of the Congress of the United States. The people of some of the States have asked that they shall be permitted to meet in convention and take action upon this matter; but the States have not asked that Congress shall submit it to the legislatures.

The grounds upon which it is claimed that this change in the Constitution should be made are that the legislatures can not be intrusted to perform this duty. If the people are clamoring against the present method because the legislatures can not be intrusted with this duty, is it to be supposed that the people are clamoring that Congress shall submit it to the tribunals which they discredit? The fact is that there is no demand for this action among the intelligent and thinking people of the United States. When the Constitution itself was adopted it was not submitted to the people except through their representative bodies in the several States then existing. The founders seemed to think that the legislatures of that day could be trusted to act upon this question or any questions of this character. The States—a few of them; one came in this morning—that ask that the question be submitted do not ask that it be submitted to the people, but they ask that it be submitted to the legislature, this discredited agency of the people; and this joint resolution under consideration does not propose to submit this amendment to the people, but it proposes to submit it to all of these discredited legislatures; and yet the very provision itself——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is not just as objectionable on that question as is the original joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. It proposes to submit the question to the legislatures.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes; and is just as vicious on that ground as is the original joint resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. I oppose the original joint resolution and the substitute.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I oppose them because there is no demand for such a change, except from the selfish interests of the country, from the coterie of men who stand on the street corner and acclaim themselves "the people."

What position would the people of the States place themselves in were they to confess that they did not possess sufficient intelligence or patriotism to elect a legislature? If they can not elect a legislature, is it to be supposed that they are more competent to elect a Senator? No; the demand for this action comes from selfish interests, men who hope, by getting around the law, to obtain place and position for themselves. I am not afraid to trust the people, to intrust them with any duty of citizenship which the law imposes upon them. If I were to say that the people of my Sate needed some supervision, I would criticize their action through which they sent me to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho for information—I do not myself remember. How many States have passed resolutions demanding that Senators be elected by the people?

Mr. HEYBURN. None of them have made any such demand. About 19 of the States have asked that a convention be called.

Mr. WILLIAMS. For this purpose?

Mr. HEYBURN. That a constitutional convention be called——

Mr. WILLIAMS. For the purpose of securing the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people?

Mr. HEYBURN. Some of them have. I think the Senator's own State placed no limitation on it, but asked that a constitutional convention be called. Some of them who have in their minds amendments in regard to organized labor include that; some of them include one thing and some another. They ask that in that constitutional convention this question of the election of Senators shall be considered; but, of course, if a constitutional convention is called, you can not limit it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. HEYBURN. A constitutional convention is all of the people; it is a town meeting of the Nation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator from Idaho admit that some 18 or 19 States—I do not remember how many—have asked for a constitutional convention for the purpose of securing the election of Senators by the people? If that be true, does not the Senator from Idaho think that it would be much safer and more conservative to submit this specific amendment through the Congress than to have called a constitutional convention whose action, as he suggests, can not be limited?

Mr. HEYBURN. I agree with the Senator, and that view of the case I had heretofore intended to present; but when the Constitution says that upon request of two-thirds of the States we shall take certain action we are not authorized to take it at the request of less than the number specified in the Constitution. If we do it, we can not claim that we do it in response to the constitutional demand of the States, and no one will claim that a sufficient number of States have asked in any manner for a change in the plan of electing Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator from Idaho this question: Frankly, does not the Senator believe that the reason why these 19 States have asked a constitutional convention for this purpose is because they thought that the Senate of the United States would never pass a resolution for amending the Constitution in the first manner provided for in the Constitution?

Mr. HEYBURN. No, Mr. President, I do not think so; and I think that a wide inquiry regarding that question would satisfy the Senator from Mississippi that that reason, if it ever prevailed, was in a very limited number of cases. I have taken some pains, in fact I have the record of the proceedings by the various legislatures, to find out how much consideration the question has received, and I challenge any Senator to show me that the matter received in any legislature where the resolution was adopted such consideration as would be given to a measure of the least importance. It has been brought forward in response to the cry and the appeal of the selfish interests of self-serving men.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I desire to be clear about one matter. I may have misunderstood the Senator. Does the Senator claim that Congress has not the right to pass a joint resolution submitting a constitutional amendment until, as a prerequisite, two-thirds of the States by their legislatures have demanded that action from Congress?

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, no. There are two separate methods provided for amending the Constitution. The provision in the Constitution under which Congress may propose amendments without the action of the States is distinct and separate, and that is the proceeding that it is sought to be had here.

Mr. REED. I thought so, but I had understood the Senator the other way, and I thought that I had probably misunderstood him.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I am thoroughly familiar——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit me a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In relation to the Senator's statement that this measure is in behalf of and is demanded by the selfish interests and not by the people, I protest. Every Democratic convention in the State of New Jersey, county as well as State, and as well the Republican conventions, county and State, have declared unequivocally for this change, and "the interests" have been decidedly against it. The Senator is utterly wrong in his position.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not use the word "interests" in the same sense as the Senator from New Jersey uses it. I have never, at least, gone so far as to denominate one class of the people "the interests" and the other "the people." They are each of them to me individuals, and each of them stands upon his own merits. I have known some very bad poor men and some very bad rich men, and I have known some very good rich men and some very good poor men. I do not classify them.

The Senator speaks of the action of the State of New Jersey in regard to this matter. I have the record of the action of the State of New Jersey, and before I close I will advise the Senator exactly as to the record of the State of New Jersey upon this question.

I reiterate that no part of the people have ever voted upon this question; and, in further response to the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I would say that when the Constitution provides that Congress may, upon the occurring of a certain event, take certain action, it means just that; that the jurisdiction comes from the occurring of the event; the jurisdiction attaches when the event occurs. Had it not been so, had the Congress been at liberty at any time to propose amendments, we perhaps might have been led far out into the wilderness long ago.

It was a very wise provision that placed a limitation upon Congress to submit amendments to the Constitution to the States or to the people. The Constitution provided two methods—first, upon the legislative appeal or demand of the requisite number of States Congress shall call a convention. That authorizes the calling of a constitutional convention with wide-open doors, that shall be the people of the United States—all of them. That is one method. That does not originate with us; it does not originate in Congress, but with the people in the States, acting through their organized government, and in no other way; but the other method that we are seeking here to invoke is that by which Congress submits to the legislatures of the States certain amendments to the Constitution to be voted upon by the legislatures. Congress has no power under the Constitution to submit amendments to be voted upon by the people. We submit amendments to the legislatures, and that is the only step that we can take in regard to the amendment of the Constitution.

We want to keep those methods separate, because we have here petitions from some States—but not the requisite number in either case—that a constitutional convention shall be called. That is because they do not care for Congress to be invested with the power of formulating the amendments; they want to formulate the amendments to be considered, as they have a right to do under the Constitution; but when Congress, regardless of any expression from the organized government of the people, shall of its own volition submit amendments, it is not at the call of the States at all; the States have nothing to do with it; and it is a piece of political impertinence on the part of the States to ask Congress to submit amendments to the Constitution except in the manner provided by the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator, then, to claim that if the legislature of any State or the legislatures of all of the States were to respectfully petition Congress to submit an amendment it would be a piece of impudence?

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I said a political impertinence. I did not mean to be rough in my expression. I think I used a conservative one. It is a question of jurisdiction.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Idaho has made the broad statement that there is no demand made for this change in the Constitution by the intelligent and thinking people of this country. If it were necessary, or if I believed that the charge made by the Senator would be seriously considered, I should desire to enter a protest against this imputation upon the intelligence of the people of my State. Both of the political parties in the State of California have declared in their platforms in favor of the change in the Constitution. The sentiment in my State is almost unanimous for it. No political party in the State of California even dared to raise the issue with respect to this change in the Constitution, knowing, as they did, what the sentiment of the whole people was on that subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope that the Senator from California and all other Senators will understand that I make no personal reference and impugn no person's integrity in this Senate or in an individual sense. I am speaking of a principle, and of that principle as applied or invoked in regard to the people generally, and if I do not make good before I have finished my remarks, I will then be a subject for judgment. I, of course, would make no personal allusion to any Senator.

Now, Mr. President, as to the manner. I want to see whether we have jurisdiction to act. The Constitution says how we shall act, and it says it in no ambiguous terms. It does not say that if the people clamor for something we shall submit amendments to the Constitution. It does not say that if some man or a million men stand up and clamor for it we shall submit it to the legislatures. It says we shall do it upon our own judgment here, and the clamor may or may not reach the ears of the Members of this body. If in the judgment of the Senate it will submit these matters to the legislature, it performs an act so inconsistent as to be utterly irreconcilable. To submit this question to the very tribunals that we are seeking to discredit would be a most singular performance.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. REED. I am not seeking to interrupt, but I asked the Senator awhile ago if he claimed that Congress did not have the power to submit this amendment until, as a prerequisite, two-thirds of the legislatures of the States had petitioned for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I answered that.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say that he did not claim that, and a little later to say that there were two distinct methods of amendment laid down—one by the calling of a constitutional convention in response to the requests of the legislatures of the States, and the other by submitting it in this way. Now, I understand the Senator in his last few words to say that we are proceeding here without authority; and I ask him again if he makes the serious claim that Congress does not have the right and authority to submit to the various legislatures this proposed amendment in the way in which it is being submitted?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator misunderstood me. At the time the Senator addressed his remarks to me I was referring only to the calling of a constitutional convention, and my reply applied only to that method. We need no insistence from any one to submit to the legislatures an amendment to the Constitution. I was addressing myself to the propriety of submitting it to the legislatures if the demand of the people is based upon the assumption that the legislatures are not fit tribunals to select Senators.

There are the two propositions. Should we submit this question to a discredited tribunal because the people are crying out, as the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] says, for the right to select a Senator directly? Where is the consistency between that cry and this action?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Idaho claim that by submitting to the various State legislatures a proposition which will give to the very people who elect them the right to vote upon the election of United States Senator that that necessarily implies a discrediting of the legislature?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; there is no question about it. You can not get away from that conclusion.

Mr. REED. I just wanted to get the Senator's view.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no way of escaping that conclusion. I started upon an inquiry as to why this was necessary, and I inquired, Is it because the people can not exercise this function through their legislature; and if they can not do this through their legislature, is the legislature any better qualified to pass upon the amendment to the Constitution? Is the legislature better qualified to amend the Constitution of the United States than it is to elect a Senator? Can its integrity be relied upon any more surely to amend the Constitution than it can to elect a Senator? Those are the questions, and that takes it out of the line of demagogy. You hear men say, "The people should elect their Senators." The people elect the legislatures; and if they are corrupt, then probably the character of the legislature might show some evidence of it; but if they are capable and pure and clean and intelligent enough to elect a legislature, then their selected men are competent to elect the Senators of the United States. I am looking for a reason for this.

I asserted that the only reason that was evident to me was that some men carried away, rightfully or otherwise, by their ambition to accomplish something that they could not accomplish in a direct way, were seeking indirect methods, and they were doing what is often done—asserting in support of their position that the people demanded it, and the people probably consisted of that man and a half a dozen friends under a lamppost. If the people want this they can call for it, and Congress will act in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. Let them do it, and you will not see me standing up here opposing it. When the requisite number of States in the constitutional manner ask that Congress shall call a convention of the people of the United States for the purpose of revising their Constitution, I shall not shirk my duty to vote for it, because the Constitution that I have sworn to uphold says you shall do it. Not that I would approve of it personally, but that I would perform a public duty under the Constitution.

But we are not in that position. The people are not asking us to do this in the numbers required by the Constitution. It is Congress, and Congress only, that initiated this movement to send it down to the legislatures and to place the final judgment in the hands of the very people whom it is claimed the people want to be relieved against.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. REED. If it were true, as the Senator from Idaho assumes it to be, that this movement is based upon the corruption or incapacity of the State legislatures, and, therefore, that it is absurd to submit the proposition to those bodies assumed to be corrupt, and if that condition existed, would it not absolutely bar the possibility of having the demand made by the necessary number of States?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. REED. And would that not leave us, on the Senator's theory, without any means of relief?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. REED. Would not that condition, if it existed, call loudly upon Congress to pass this measure and submit it to the various legislatures and present to the people of the various States sharply the proposition that the men they were about to elect to the legislature would have to pass upon this question?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. The people of the United States represent something more than the legislature of the States. The people of the United States are not a proper subject for impeachment in determining their capacity for self-government upon any history or experience we have had. They have selected the great Presidents of the United States of all parties. They have selected the Congress of the United States, with all of its grand achievements and magnificent manhood. The people have done it through the constitutional agencies and methods that have prevailed during the history of the country.

Mr. REED. Just one further question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. REED. If the people possess all these virtues and all this intelligence, then why can they not be trusted to pick their Senators directly?

Mr. HEYBURN. The people have not made a demand in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. The people are given the opportunity of changing the Constitution. When I say the people I do not mean the coterie of people who are connected with office seeking and office holding. I mean the great silent mass of this people who speak only in the silence of the ballot box. Those people have not spoken. Men have volunteered to speak for them, but the people have not spoken, and if this is a crying need and a great necessity, we can rely upon it that the people will ask Congress for redress against these evils, if they be evils.

Now, Mr. President, the history of a government is its record to which we appeal in determining the wisdom of its action. I had started to say that the number of Senators that have been selected from 1789 to 1909—I have not included this winter—was eleven hundred and eighty who served in this body. Some of them have been contested. There have been 161 contests, including the existing contests. The number of Senators who have been denied a seat is 7. That is a pretty good record. Can you take any body of men on earth that will show a better record than that? Can you go into the churches, and into the colleges, and into any walk of life, and show me where out of eleven hundred and eighty men elected to the performance of such duties as rest upon Senators but 7 of them have been found not entitled to their seats? That speaks something for the record.

Is not that some justification of a system of government? Do you think that if you take the power of the election of Senators from the accredited and selected representatives of the people in the legislatures you will get better results? Do you think that if you throw the election of a United States Senator into the downtown wards of a city you will get a purer deliverance of right? Do you believe that if the question of the election of a Senator is subject to all of the trades and the bargains and the vicissitudes of an election you will get a better result than you will at the hands of the selected of the people? It does not appeal to me that you will, and it is not the highest purpose that we could have in view that we maintain and keep up to the high standard the personnel of the members of this body.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. A moment ago the distinguished Senator pronounced a eulogy upon the purity and intelligence of the American people. Now I understand that he challenges the purity and intelligence of a portion of them. I want to ask him if that same impure, vicious, and bad element which he thinks should not vote direct for United States Senator does not now vote direct for the men who elect United States Senators?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the distinction is not obvious, I am afraid the Senator will have to appeal to some one else to make it so. I have not challenged the integrity or the ability of the American people to perform the duties of citizenship, but am I to be understood in that as accrediting the discredited citizenship of the country that languishes in prisons or has discredited itself so that it can not live in one place long enough to acquire the right to vote?

Mr. President, I can not dwindle this discussion down to a point—and I say it with due respect to the Senator—that would necessarily present the criticism and the challenge of the Senator. I think the Senator seems to be quite devoted to the idea of finding that I am not consistent in my remarks.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will be patient until I have concluded my remarks—I do not mean by that that I object to interruptions, because I do not; I rather prefer, when matters arise in the minds of Senators that would seem to be antagonistic to my expressions, that they should make them known—but when I said that the American people could be intrusted with citizenship, I meant the American people who are entitled by their training and their integrity to exercise those rights, and I did not mean that there would not be within that great body of just men knots and curls and quips of irregularity that would affect the election either of Representatives or of Senators; but when those people have selected the legislature they have taken picked men from their community to represent them; they have expressed their contentment to be so represented.

Now, Mr. President, there are some facts in regard to this matter that are pertinent. There is no need to amend the Constitution of the United States to do away with the evil of what you might call deadlocks in legislatures. Congress has the power by legislation to remedy it, because Congress can provide under the Constitution as it is how the legislature shall elect a Senator. It needs no amendment to the Constitution. It is competent for Congress to say, as the legislatures of some States have said and, under the rules, conventions have adopted, that after a certain number of ballots the low man shall be dropped, and so on. That always results in a very speedy determination of a deadlock.

I have seen it in operation at times during my political career where, the inability of a convention to nominate a candidate being demonstrated, a rule would be adopted that after the third ballot, or the fifth, or any other number, the low man should be dropped, and then after the next ballot the next low man should be dropped, and so on. It speedily resulted in the untying of these knots.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has proposed a method of resorting to a plurality vote after so many ballots. That is feasible, but I prefer the rule of dropping the low man, perhaps because I have been somewhat familiar with it; but either of them would answer. Dropping the low man still elects by a majority, which I think is a better plan. When you have dropped the low man until it is down to two men of a party, if you please, it will be determined by that ballot and by a majority vote.

I started to inquire as to the necessity of this amendment. I have not found it yet. No Senator has pointed out any necessity for this amendment to me, except that it comes in a cry from somewhere, and when you undertake to trace that back to the source you find that it is somebody who could not get what he wanted very often in the regular way, and he thought if some new rule could be found for him he might possibly stand a better chance. I do not say that to be invidious. I do not intend to apply it to any Senator. I am talking now of matters of experience in political life, and when I use the term "political life" I mean the pursuit of the study of government, the science of government.

Has any necessity presented itself for this action? I am now talking about the simple question of changing the Constitution so that the legislature shall not perform the duty of selecting the representatives from the State—the big State and the little State alike. It is not the people, the body and mass of the people, that is represented by the Senator from a State. He represents the people from all States. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is as much a Senator for the State of Idaho as he is for the State of Mississippi; yes, he is, under the Constitution, and his duty is the same, the pledge of his faith is the same in the making and the consideration of the making of law. The Senator from New York is as much a Senator for the State of Ohio as is the Senator that Ohio selected. That has been recognized throughout the history of this country. Your vote is not confined to its effect upon the interests of your own people. In three-fourths of the questions upon which we vote the State of some Senator has no particular interest, but you vote because you are a Senator of the United States as a whole.

This goes to the question of the character of representation for which a Senator stands, and that goes to the question as to how that character should be represented. The State has a medium provided by the Constitution of the United States. Its legislature speaks for it. A Senator in this body may speak and does speak for his State. When he votes upon a question affecting the whole Nation if he does not rise above that, he falls below the duty of a Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I approach a question directly involved in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. The joint resolution itself provides for the repeal of that provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to change or modify the rules which a State makes in regard to this matter. Yesterday the inquiry came from somewhere as to how the United States could compel a State to continue to exist. It seemed to be assumed or conceded by some that a State might cease to exist and the Government of the United States would be helpless.

Mr. President, such a contention is to me so startling, so threatening to the continuity and continuance of this Government as to appall me. Do you think that a State by failing to exercise its constitutional duty of sending representatives to this body or to the other could terminate its obligations as a State of the Union? In this age, in the light of this experience of most of us or some of us, such a proposition can not be sustained. You can not destroy this Government by inaction any more than you can by action. The failure to exercise the duty on the part of a part of the people would not affect the right or the fact that the other part of the people would exercise it.

If none exercised it, it is no longer a State government. A State government is not constituted alone of the State officers or the officers within the State. To be a State it must be a part of the Nation. To be a part of the Nation it must be represented in the departments of the Government wherein the Constitution provides that it shall be represented. If it fails in this it is only a Territory. Statehood is not geography; it is men; it is constituted of the actions of men; and if men do not or will not act there is no statehood. If any State in this Union failed or refused to respond to its constitutional duty to be represented in Congress, Congress would and could take possession of that territory, because it is all the territory of the United States, and they could organize a Government in that territory according to and within the constitutional provisions in such cases.

I never want to see the day when the truth of that assertion will have to be tested, but if the day does come, those who delude themselves with the idea that a State may sulk itself out of existence will be rudely awakened from their dream. Congress can organize a territorial government in the absence of a State government, and a State government is not complete or efficient unless it is represented in Congress in the constitutional manner. Congress can enforce its action in taking possession of the affairs of those people as it would enforce its power over an alien foe.

It is not fashionable among patriots to consider how this Nation may be destroyed by neglect. It is not wise among statesmen to consider how that the Government is so powerless and weak that it can not maintain its own existence, and it is not maintaining its own existence when it permits one of the States to dissolve itself out of the Union by inaction. That territory belongs none the less to the Government of the United States, the lord of the fee, the sovereign of the domain, because that the people within it refuse to perform constitutional duties.

Why should not Congress then retain the power peacefully by allowing section 4 to remain as it is, where the express power is given to compel representation in both Houses of Congress? If you, if any part of the people, take the nominal power away from Congress, and, acting upon that, the people of any State decline the duties of citizenship, Congress will nevertheless have the power to act from a different standpoint, but none the less effective, in the absence of any provision in the Constitution authorizing Congress in express terms to compel the performance of its nationalism or nationalship by a State, to go in and perform it for them. Why should they not? There is no man within the sound of my voice so unpatriotic as to maintain that he would not by his effort, official or personal, undertake to uphold the supremacy within any State that refused to exercise its political duty or to perform its political duty toward the maintenance of the Government.

It takes all the States of this Union to make the Government. No one can drop out of the ranks. Now, they are proposing by this amendment to the Constitution to take away from Congress the power to compel a State to perform the constitutional functions of a State. That is what they are doing. I do not need to go out beyond the pages of the history of our country to call attention to what might have happened. It is a difficult question to discuss and one for which the necessity of discussion should never arise. I am not going to enter into the question from an individual standpoint nor at any length. I will merely say that there was a time in this country when it was claimed and strongly maintained that a State had a right to withdraw from this body or from Congress or from any department of the Government, and that the Government should have no power to prevent it. Why, that was the very commencement of the troubles that resulted in war. It started right over there. Look up the history of it and see where the first declaration was made, and by whom it was made, that a State could exercise its own pleasure about being represented here, and that Congress had no power to compel its representation, or in any manner to control it.

Without going over any part of that terrible time when that question was being thrashed out, it is sufficient to say that it was, and I do not believe that there is a man within the sound of my voice who ever wants to see such a question thrashed out in the household of the American people. If we have war, let it not be within our own household; let it be for the defense and the honor of our flag and our country as against some other nation than our own.

Do not raise this question. I have been accused in the public press, and I do not know where else—I do not care—of waving the bloody flag in my discussion of these questions. Great God, Senators! they must be discussed when you force their discussion upon us. It is discussed, not in anger, not in terms of recrimination, but weighed in the balance of patriotic and generous discussion.

The question of State rights is involved in this fourth section of the Constitution. As it was written in that section, so was it the cause of the great strife which no sane man can but regret. It was the question of the right of Congress to interfere where the necessity for interference existed in the affairs of a State, and in the great arbitrament of war it was decided that that section 4 should not be written out of the Constitution of the United States. That was in the verdict, because it was in the indictment. I am not appealing to Senators on this side in regard to that, because if I thought there was in the breast of any one of them a difference of opinion in regard to it I would lose faith in the great party of which I have always been a member. I do not believe there is a remnant of that sentiment in the heart of any man on the other side of the House. I have heard you say, and I believed you when you said it, that those were buried questions and abandoned claims, and that you would stand as ready to defend this country against dissolution either by sword or by ballot as your ancestors did. I believe you, and I have no desire to bring up those questions. But they are forced upon us here in that we are asked to repeal the provision in the Constitution that was the battle cry of our armies, and I protest against it.

Necessity for its enforcement or application might never arise. Generations come and go. Before me to-day there are only a handful of men on either side who participated in the settlement of that question, but it is just as necessary for the generations that follow those who did participate in it to correctly understand the bearing of the question upon our existence and upon the integrity of our Government as it was for those who took the responsibility in that hour. Shall we be less thoughtful, shall we be less patriotic and less quick to respond to an attack upon the Constitution, civil or military, than were our ancestors? Is it a small thing to take away from Congress a power that was given it by the founders merely because there is nothing at the moment that would seem to make it material one way or the other? Since I was born there have been men who ridiculed the idea here in this Chamber that any difficulty could ever arise by reason of the exercise of the rights of the Government under this section 4. Why should it be taken out? Let us look for a reason for that. Does anyone want to do anything that the Government of the United States would be justified in stopping? Does anyone want to do anything that would be interfered with by this just provision of the Constitution? If they do, why do they? If they do, should they be permitted to do it?

I say those who are proposing that we take this power away from the Government, and it is a power, what would they do that they can not do now? Why do they want it repealed? Is it because they anticipate some conditions where the Government under existing provisions would interfere, and under the conditions that would exist after its repeal could not? Is that it? Be candid, brave, and fair, and tell us why you want this section 4 of Article I repealed. It is not sufficient to cry out "Repeal! Repeal!" It is necessary in the deliberations which properly accompany the consideration of these great questions that reasons should be given, and reasons that convince the reason of men.

This is not a place for negative action. There must be an affirmative reason in this body for the exercise of the functions of office by every Senator and all the Senators. There must be an affirmative reason for doing it, and I challenge any man to state here the affirmative reason why section 4 of Article I of the Constitution should be abolished, wherein it provides for the Government of the United States, which is as great as the aggregate of all of them, to perform its functions in the hour when its judgment dictates that it should act. I speak of that in support of the provisions contained in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. Were his amendment confined to that I would support it, but I speak against the provision in the resolution of that Senator, more properly speaking, wherein it provides for a change in the method of the election of Senators in an unconstitutional manner—that is, by a direct vote of the people.

What next? What will we face next here in this Chamber? The recall perhaps of officers of the United States at the changing whim of local communities. Do you think that you would get a self-respecting man to occupy a position in this Chamber when his right so to do was likely at any time to be challenged and canceled? I would not care for the acquaintance of a man who would accept a place of responsibility on such terms. Is there nothing left of the spirit which actuated the generations that have gone before us, who have maintained that the value of a government rests in its stability, that the value of a law rests in its stability and its certainty of application? Those are the very foundation principles upon which our Government was founded. The violation of those principles sent our patriots to battle against England and her allies and to win out the Constitution and the government we enjoy. It was because we never knew in New England or Pennsylvania or Virginia or the Carolinas or Georgia whether the law that you were striving to obey to-day, that you are striving to rest your personal property rights upon to-day, would be the law of to-morrow, when royal edict might change overnight the law of property and person.

We recognize the necessity for stability in government; we recognize the necessity of a fixed tenure of office, not changeable at the will of any monarch or superior power, except for cause defined and limited by the people, and yet to-day seems to be the day of amendment. Some congregation or aggregation of people to-day are in session who have proposed to amend the Ten Commandments, seriously, not in jest, and I have the proceedings of their meeting in my desk here. They are only a little in advance of the kind of men who are to-day looking rather how to change the law than how to obey it; how to degrade the law rather than to elevate it as the standard of stability, fixed, stable government of the people, by the people, a representative form of government that we have all sworn allegiance to. When we take our oath of office we pledge ourselves to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. That means its principles; and the conditions under which we are justified in attempting to change those principles are mighty uncertain. The principle of representative government is the very first underlying groundwork of our system. When the fathers were in session to determine our form of government, the first question was, What kind of a government? There was a school for a democratic government along the lines and principles of the town meeting, where the people would come together and declare their will. Of course, that was impracticable. Men who had seen a little more of this limited world knew that was impracticable. The wise men who had read the history of mankind and mankind's government said "we can not all go on every occasion to determine these questions, but we will send the best we can select." A bad man may select a good man to represent him, and is more apt to do it than people generally think, because if the man realizes that he is bad, he generally realizes the necessity of having a good man, more perhaps than does the good man. They settled upon that principle of representative government, divided into units, ascending upward from the little coterie of citizens who select a representative, to a convention of the first magnitude, and that to the second, and so on up until, in the great electoral college, we select men who select the President of the United States. We have never been betrayed in the history of the country. That speaks well for representative government. No man was ever elected to the electoral college who did not perform the duty as his constituency had elected him to perform it.

You wipe out in a large measure this principle of self-government. I know the old argument. I have heard it. They say, Is not an election by the people of the State for Senator just as much an election as it is if they act through one medium—the legislature? No; it is not. The people of the States are individual members of this great Government. In some States there are millions of them and in others hundreds of thousands, but the hundreds of thousands represent as much in this body as do the millions.

I am astonished at the Representatives of some of the smaller States supporting a measure of this kind, knowing that they are only adding to the agitation of the hour that may—pray God it will not—result in a constitutional convention. When the constitutional convention has signed its work, the old Constitution with all its restrictions is gone.

I have been reminded—and I have heard it even spoken here in terms of confidence—that the prohibition in the Constitution against the destruction of the equal representation in the Senate could never be changed. A constitutional convention is bigger than the Constitution; a constitutional convention can just as well change that clause as it can change any other. It can adopt a constitution that is different in every respect in principle or in detail if it wants to. When the people of the United States meet in constitutional convention there is no power on earth greater than the will of that body, and they can, and they will, provide that the States shall be represented in this body according to their population. We should then have two Houses of Congress upon the same basis, representing the same element of our people. One of them would be a little larger than the other, and its Members would have a longer term of office, but there would be no other distinction. Instead of representing the States of which this Nation is composed, they would represent themselves, subject to review by the people at intervals.

Mr. President, the question is most serious; it involves the principle upon which the Government will some day rest with its life at stake. The habit of amending the Constitution is a dangerous one.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WORKS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was struck with one statement which the Senator from Idaho has made, and that is that he thinks it would be possible for an amendment to be made to the Constitution, without the consent of all the States, which would deprive a State in the Union of its equal representation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Absolutely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call his attention to the fact that Article V, which provides how amendments shall be made, provides that an amendment may be proposed either by the two Houses of Congress, when two-thirds consent, or by a convention; but in either event the amendment is simply proposed. The convention has no more power to adopt an amendment to the Constitution than has Congress. Congress in the one case proposes it and the convention in the other case proposes it, but no amendment can be made to the Constitution until it has been ratified by three-fourths of the States. Does the Senator think it would be possible to adopt an amendment to the Constitution without the consent of three-fourths of the States of the Union?

Mr. HEYBURN. A constitutional convention is without limit as to its power. When the people of the United States meet again for the purpose of making an organic law, that prohibition is at an end.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the Government is at an end.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Government is being reborn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is revolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a possibility, and within the power of a constitutional convention, because a constitutional convention represents all the people, and all the people can do as they please.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But when that is done, that is not an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not speaking of anything except it be under this joint resolution. There is nothing proposed in this legislation that calls for the determination of that question. I was speaking of the tendency of the age, as to certain people and certain bodies professing certain principles.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, does the Senator think that under this Constitution it would be possible to amend it so as to deprive any State in the Union of its equal representation without the consent of every State in the Union?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not under this amendment; but I am speaking of the age of amendments and the proposals or propositions for change. I was merely directing the eye into the sky of the future to see a reflex from the idiosyncracies and the insanities of some organizations of to-day; that is all.

Mr. President, I have been met with that proposition so often that I always think I am going to make it plain that I am not claiming that they can do it under this amendment, but I am decrying the age of innovation and change. Men do not realize the responsibility involved in change. One change breeds another. Familiarity with change is apt to make men hunt for changes rather than investigate the necessity for such changes. That is the idea that I have. I do not want it to appear, and it must not appear, that I have claimed that under this joint resolution it would be possible; but just let a certain element in this country once get away from the shackles of the law, once forget the respect that is due to the fundamental law of our land, and no man can foresee where it will end.

Do you imagine for a moment that the people are not greater than the Constitution? Do you imagine for a moment that the people are not capable and able to throw down any obstructions to their free will in the making of a government? When I say "the people" I mean a majority of the people, because this is a government of majorities.

Mr. President, if the consideration of this question is circumscribed or is to be circumscribed by the tumult of the hour or by a consideration of the result that will follow the discussion of it upon the fortunes of this man or that, we had as well let it go to a vote and allege as a reason that this was not a reasoning body; that men would not listen to reason and did not care for it.

Mr. President, I would not undertake to conclude the discussion of a question of the magnitude and importance of this within the short time that I have been discussing it. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is now in the Chamber and, I believe, is ready to proceed, and, with the consent of the Senate, I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin and resume the consideration of this question at another convenient time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me a moment, I desire to make a motion. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, without discussing the motion, I would say there are two committees which will meet to-morrow of which I am a member. To appear before one of those committees a large number of men, as I am advised, have come from Chicago and even from a greater distance to be heard, pursuant to a resolution of the Senate. In addition to that the Committee on Finance is sitting and there are many men in attendance, waiting, I think, to appear before that committee. I think if the Senator will be patient for a few days we shall make better headway. To-morrow the committee having under consideration the cold-storage bill will meet, and I should like to have from 10 o'clock to-morrow until 2 to dispose of that matter, and then I will accommodate myself, so far as the Committee on Finance is concerned, to the 12 o'clock arrangement, but I wish the Senator would postpone his motion for one day.

Mr. BORAH. I would be glad, indeed, to accommodate all Senators with reference to the matter, and I will undertake to do so. With that in view, I ask unanimous consent that upon the 1st day of June, immediately after the morning business, the pending joint resolution, together with all amendments, be taken up for consideration, and that a vote be had upon the amendments and the joint resolution before the close of that legislative day.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would consent to leave the hour of meeting at 2 o'clock to-morrow. I only ask for to-morrow for the reason that there are a number of gentlemen in Washington who wish to conclude their testimony before the Committee on Finance, and if the Senator will consent to let the hour of meeting be 2 o'clock to-morrow, it would give those parties a chance to finish their testimony and leave the city to-morrow afternoon, and many of them tell me that they must go to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall not object to the motion to meet at 12 o'clock on Friday.

Mr. SMOOT. On that account I ask the junior Senator from Idaho to let the hour of meeting be 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who asks that the Senate adjourn until 2 o'clock, instead of 12 o'clock, to-morrow, because of some hearing before the Finance Committee, can the Senator from Utah tell the Senate whether, in his opinion, we will likely conclude the hearings before that committee by an adjournment until 2 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in my opinion we can get through with the hearings on the paper schedule to-morrow by 2 o'clock. I know of but one or two other witnesses who intend to appear before the committee, and I have every reason to believe that it will not be later than Friday when all of the witnesses will have had a hearing before the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Utah would, with a full knowledge of the facts, undertake to fix Friday as the time for closing the hearings, because there are men here representing interests that have not yet been heard at all.

Mr. SMOOT. There is another day for the hearings.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are men representing certain interests who have not been able to obtain a hearing, not because they were not ready to be heard and anxious to be heard.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to say, if I may be permitted, without assuming the prerogative of criticizing the Committee on Finance or any other committee, that the Committee on Finance has now been engaged well on toward three weeks on these hearings, and the time has come when they should be concluded and some action taken by the committee on the bill referred to it, so that it may either be killed in the committee, or at least that the Senate may know what the disposition of the committee is. Not only that, Mr. President, but the Committee on Privileges and Elections has a bill before it, and has for a month or thereabout. The Committee on the Census, of which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is the chairman, has a bill before it, and other important measures have been sent here by the House of Representatives; and these committees are delaying action and postponing and procrastinating in a way that ought not to be permitted to go on without protest, and I protest against it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President. I inquire whether the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is pending, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. That motion is not debatable, and, unless the Senator from Idaho withdraws it, I shall insist upon the regular order.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the motion?

Mr. GALLINGER. That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to answer the statement made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], so far as the Finance Committee is concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that should be done when it can properly be done. I think we had better observe the rule.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think I shall withdraw my motion, but before doing so I feel compelled to say that I doubt very much whether or not I am doing the proper thing.

Mr. BAILEY (to Mr. BORAH). Renew it later.

Mr. BORAH. The difficulty with the situation is that it is impossible to accommodate everyone in a question of this kind, and there is no way that I know of to close up the matter except to come here and dispose of it.

After to-morrow—and I say this for the benefit of Senators who may desire to be away or otherwise—if there is a majority of Senators in this Chamber in favor of proceeding with this matter until it is disposed of, I shall feel compelled to ask that that be done. If there is a majority who desire otherwise, of course it is in the hands of the Senate; but, so far as the Senator who has charge of the joint resolution is concerned, I shall insist upon a disposal of it after to-morrow and consideration of it during all the hours that the Senate is in session.

Mr. STONE. We have been hearing that for a good while. I should like to have it go on now.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri that this is done just as much to accommodate Senators on the other side of the Chamber as upon this side. There have been repeated requests for postponement upon both sides of the Chamber, and there is no partisanship in this move.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I want to say for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that I happen to be a member of all three of the committees under criticism—the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the Committee on the Census, and the Finance Committee—and I cheerfully bear whatever share of that criticism belongs to me. Not in the way of exculpating myself, for that is not necessary, but to do justice to the chairman of the Census Committee, who is also a member of the Finance Committee, I will say that I have conferred with him about the apportionment bill, and he has assured me that he will call that committee together as soon as the matter before the Finance Committee is disposed of.

I want to say to the Senator from Missouri also that I have no doubt that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will report the publicity campaign bill, and, without intimating a threat, because that would not be in order nor would it be justified by the conditions, I have no doubt that that committee will report that bill, and if it does not do so, I mean to make a motion to discharge it.

As for the Finance Committee, I am ready to conclude its labors even if there are some gentlemen who have not been heard; but it has not been the practice of Senate committees to close their doors in the face of any American citizen who comes in good faith and asks to be heard respecting any matter under consideration. While I myself would be ready to take a vote on the measure before that committee in the morning—indeed they could not please me better than to summon the committee back to their room this afternoon and take the vote—I would not consent to terminate the hearings so long as there is any American citizen asking in good faith to be heard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think perhaps the Senator from Texas ought to modify his statement somewhat. The Senator from Texas does not intend to give the Senate and the country to understand that just so long as anybody would come to the committee desiring to be heard we would continue to hear them. If that were the case, an organized movement might be made to keep on sending people there.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Mississippi did not catch my expression. I said so long as they came "in good faith." Of course, if I should become convinced that there was any such understanding amongst the people who appeared there, I would end the hearings at once.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to say just a word in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri in regard to the status of the bill which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The bill that he has in mind—the publicity bill——

Mr. STONE. That is the bill.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Was by direction of the committee placed in the hands of a subcommittee, which has been appointed and notified, and two members of which have been necessarily absent this week, so that they could not attend the meeting of the committee. One of them is the junior Senator from Iowa, who is necessarily out of the city. I expect that the next regular meeting of the committee will be on Saturday, and I fully expect that the subcommittee will be prepared at that time to make a report to the full committee. There has been no disposition on the part of any member of the committee to make delay in respect to that matter, and I think that the Senator's fears are entirely groundless.

Mr. CULBERSON and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin desired to proceed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator proceeds, I desire to know what became of the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho withdrew the motion in reference to the time of meeting.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask unanimous consent to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CULBERSON. Do I understand the Senator will renew the motion to-morrow to meet hereafter at 12 o'clock?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the Senate temporarily lay aside the unfinished business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR THE SESSION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may be permitted to say just a word before resuming my argument upon the resolution, as a sort of answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], as chairman of the Committee on the Census I want to say that from the time of the appointment of the committee on committees there has been no opportunity to call together the Committee on the Census, unless I was willing to desert the hearings of the Committee on Finance.

Now, I want to set at rest the Senator from Missouri and every other Senator here; and I know there are many Senators who feel some anxiety about the apportionment bill. I will state very frankly my position upon that bill. I am opposed to it as it passed the House of Representatives, but I do not propose to use any power that I may have as chairman of the Committee on the Census to defeat the consideration of that bill, because that would be in opposition to what I believe is the duty of Members of this Senate, and just as soon as that committee can be called together for the consideration of that bill, without neglecting other business which seems to be equally or more important, that committee will be called together, and that bill I have no doubt will be promptly reported out. And I have little doubt that it will be reported out favorably, notwithstanding my attitude with respect to it.

I want to say to Senators who are anxious for its passage that I have no doubt, from suggestions that have been made to me by Senators, that it will be debated somewhat at length upon this floor when it is reported out, so that it can not be passed at once even if it were reported out. But at the first open day——

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do; with very great pleasure.

Mr. STONE. I suppose the bill will be debated at considerable length when it is reported. I suppose the bill for publicity in campaign expenses will be debated at considerable length.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Allow me to interrupt the Senator to say that the Committee on the Census has nothing to do with that bill.

Mr. STONE. Of course; I know that perfectly well. But the time that will be consumed in the debate of the reapportionment bill, the publicity bill, and other bills might be occupied now, while the Finance Committee is struggling with these hearings, these political speeches that are being made before the committee, when we are sitting there day after day and week after week listening to some of them repeated over and over again, the same gentlemen appearing before the Finance Committee who appeared before it only two or three months ago—many of them at least; speeches printed and coming back, occupying days in traveling over the same ground.

Now, we might be debating the bills to which I have referred and getting them out of the way, so that when if the Lord is willing and the Finance Committee to permit a report upon the tariff bill, we may take it up and not have some other bill as the unfinished business in the way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in response to the suggestions of the Senator from Missouri, I will say that when the apportionment bill is debated I should like to be present on the floor of the Senate and not in attendance upon the hearings of the Committee on Finance.

Regarding former hearings, I think it proper to say that the hearings held before the Committee on Finance of some former Congress have nothing to do with the hearings held before the committee as now composed. At the time that the hearings were held heretofore—at a former session of Congress—I do not think there was a very clear understanding in the country as to the proposed reciprocity treaty. Sitting as a member of the Committee on Finance during these hearings I must say that it has not occurred to me that any of the time was wasted. I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that I am quite as ready as he is, when the people who ought fairly to be heard have been heard, to act upon that bill. I have no disposition to delay action on that or any other bill.

Mr. STONE. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Is it not a fact that the hearings had before the Finance Committee during the closing days of the last session of Congress and the hearings had before the Ways and Means Committee of the House are published and accessible to every member of the Finance Committee and every Member of the Senate?

Many of the gentlemen who have appeared before the Finance Committee had appeared two or three months ago before the Finance Committee or the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and their statements being substantially the same as repeated the other day, have been printed—printed not once, but twice in many cases. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] tells me just now that one of the men took 10 hours at these hearings. The Senator from Wisconsin must also know that it often happens—I do not know but more often than otherwise—that during these hearings now going on before the Finance Committee we sit there and listen to these discourses with less than a quorum of the committee present. I have been there myself when there were not over four or five members of the committee present at the hearing. So the committee is not intensely interested in them; and I do not think anybody else is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suppose it is true that some of the men who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Finance as constituted in a prior Congress have appeared before this committee. I was not a member of the Committee on Finance at that time. I suppose the Senator from Missouri was. Perhaps he had the opportunity, the full opportunity at that time, to interrogate those who appeared before that committee, but there are many new members on the committee who had not that opportunity, and they may not be satisfied to take the statements of those who appeared before the committee in former Congresses and swallow them just as they were presented, and may desire to ask some questions. It seems to me that if these investigations mean anything, they ought to be permitted to proceed, affording to members of the committee that opportunity.

I think it is true, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] through the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that one man there has taken perhaps a day—maybe 10 hours; parts of two or three days. But I think it is fair to say that, probably, in so far as the hearings of that committee have been protracted they have been protracted largely by discussions between members of the committee rather than by the time taken up by people who appeared before the committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me before he proceeds to his remarks on the Lorimer case, I should like to say a few words regarding the matter in hand.

It is perfectly obvious that great dissatisfaction exists amongst the Members of this body as to the manner in which the business of the Senate is being conducted. There was a time when the dominant party, through its leaders, with the acquiescence of that party, laid down a definite program for legislative action. Now, we have no dominant party, and we have no recognized leaders of a dominant party, and instead of the rule of the elder statesmen, as heretofore, we are now having the rule of chance and chaos.

Mr. BAILEY. It makes every man equal.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It makes every man equal and equally inefficient and ineffective, and it makes the Senate of the United States the subject of much animadversion.

Is it not important that we should determine now that the Senate of the United States shall be a self-governing body, not a chaotic body, controlled by chance, but a self-governing body with a definite program of action?

I am admonished by the Senator from Wisconsin that he wishes to go on with his argument. If he objects to my holding the floor for five or six minutes longer, of course I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I do not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. When I was interrupted I was suggesting that the Senate should prove to the world that it is a self-governing body, able to map out its line of action, its program of legislation. This is a little more difficult to do at an extra session than at a regular session, for tradition has pointed out practically the line of procedure at a regular session and an extra session is always, of course, in its character exceptional. The President of the United States has indicated to us what subject we should take up—the reciprocity treaty—and doubtless he desires that that subject alone should be considered. We have indications of his views from time to time upon that subject, and the question is whether the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States coincide with the President in that view, or whether they are disposed to take up other questions; and, if so, what other questions?

Now, it is clearly the intention of the Senate to take up other questions. We have had that indicated in the debate that has taken place—the question with reference to the apportionment, the question with reference to campaign contributions, and the pending question relating to the election of United States Senators by the people. Shall we rest content with those questions or shall we determine what other questions we will take up, and when we will take them up?

We have between the present day and the regular session in December six months. Shall we determine to employ the entire six months in this work or shall we determine to apply only a part of it; and if so, how much? Why should we not determine at the start that very question as to whether we will take a recess on the 1st of July during the hot season and resume our session during the temperate season some time in September, or whether we will swelter here during these hot months and finally be driven into adjournment by conditions of discomfort without action?

Mr. President, I have presented certain resolutions upon this question, resolutions calling for the sense of the Senate as to what questions it shall take up for action during the extra session, and what questions it shall simply consider through committees, with a view to a report at the regular session and immediate action. I suggested that nine questions should be taken up during the extra session—all of them pressing questions, including those that have been referred to on the floor this day. I have suggested that several other pressing questions relating to reform and constructive legislation should be taken up by the appropriate committees, so that they may be able to make their reports to us at the next regular session, with a view to decisive action. There is an opportunity for us to clear the slate, to take up all important questions upon which public opinion is now made up and upon which Congress lags far behind public opinion.

I hope that these resolutions will be taken up, and that by a process of elimination, perhaps, or a process of addition, the Senate of the United States will express by resolution its sense as to what subjects shall be taken up for action during the extra session and what questions should be considered through committees, for report early in the next session, and when a recess shall be taken during the hot season, so that the Senate of the United States, controlled not by mere chance and accident, but by reason, can determine upon an orderly procedure with reference to the determination of these very important questions.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution.

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar 4, Senate resolution 6, by Mr. LA FOLLETTE: A resolution to appoint a special committee to investigate certain charges relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish now to take up the consideration of the testimony in this important case, which I am asking the Senate to reopen, at the point where I was interrupted yesterday.

I had just called the attention of the Senate to the testimony of Frank J. Russell, a resident of Marquette. He could not be compelled to appear before the committee of the Senate of the Illinois Legislature, but he consented to make an affidavit, which was submitted to that committee.

Robert C. Lowe, a resident of Marquette, made affidavit as follows concerning Shelly B. Jones's conversation in his presence and hearing at the People's Drug Store, Marquette, on April 5, 1911:

> You have read this stuff about Kohlsaat and Hines relative to the "slop fund" that is said to have elected LORIMER? Well, Hines told Rush Culver and I when he was up here to look over the Northern Lumber Co. property that he was the man that handled the "slop fund" that elected LORIMER. The three of us were having a good time that evening in Marquette, and having been drinking a little "Scotch," Hines was talkative and bragged about different lumber deals he had put through. Finally he stated that LORIMER had promised him (Hines) that he (LORIMER) would stand for a high protective tariff on lumber, and because of that promise Hines said he had collected the "slop fund." In a later conversation Mr. Jones stated to me that this conversation took place about a couple of years ago, shortly after LORIMER'S election to the United States Senate. Jones said it was either at E. H. Bush's saloon or at the Hotel Marquette bar, both of which places are in the city of Marquette, that Hines made these statements. At this time Hines mentioned $100,000 as the amount of the "slop fund," according to Jones's statement in my presence.

The witness, Mr. Bergener, was present at this conversation also.

E. D. Mosher, a resident of Marquette, made affidavit as follows concerning Shelly B. Jones's conversation in his presence and hearing at the People's Drug Store, Marquette, on April 1, 1911:

> Edward Hines, the Chicago lumberman, told me in a conversation with Rush Culver and myself that he had "put LORIMER over" as a United States Senator, and that he had collected a fund of $100,000 to do it. It was while we three were discussing the tariff on lumber.

The witness before mentioned, Mr. Bergener, was present at this conversation.

I now come, Mr. President, to the testimony of Edward Hines, of Chicago, president of the Edward Hines Lumber Co.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not understand whether the affidavits read by the Senator from Wisconsin were submitted to the Illinois Senate committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, they were. They were taken by an agent or investigator for that committee who was sent out to procure the attendance of these witnesses in other States where not being able to procure the attendance of the witnesses he secured affidavits where he could, and where he could not he made affidavits of conversations with these people.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, these affidavits were filed with the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. These affidavits were filed with the committee of the Illinois Senate that was conducting the investigation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And they are a part of the record?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. They are a part of the record here.

Mr. President, if the entire record as taken by the committee has not reached the Senate when I shall conclude what I have to say on this case, I purpose as soon as I have finished with these records to ask to have them printed as a Senate document in order that Senators may have access to the whole testimony of the case.

Now, Mr. President, I had intended to submit to the Senate nearly all of Mr. Hines's testimony, as given to the committee, but, prompted by a desire to conclude if I could to-day, I have gone over my condensation of it since the session of yesterday and have marked out certain pages, the omission of which I believe does not in any way impair the continuity of the testimony, or make for or against Mr. Hines. I will ask that the testimony of Mr. Hines be printed in full in the course of my remarks, although I shall not take the time of the Senate to give all of it here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Hines was asked this question:

> Q. Mr. Hines, were you interested in any way in the election of a United States Senator, State of Illinois, year 1909?—A. Well, I don't know exactly how I can answer that question intelligently.
> Q. Did you interest yourself in the matter?—A. Yes.
> Q. Will you state to the committee in a general way what your interest was and what you did in connection with the matter?—A. Well, I just don't exactly know how I should answer that question, Mr. Healy; won't you ask me a little more specifically?
> Q. When was your attention first called to the matter of the election of a United States Senator from this State?—A. Oh, I think in the spring of 1909.
> Q. And where were you at that time?—A. I was in Washington.
> Q. With whom did you confer about the matter?—A. Why, I think first, if I recollect correctly, with United States Senator PENROSE, or Senator Aldrich; I am not certain. * * *
> Q. About when was it you talked with these gentlemen about that matter?—A. I think it was in April, the 1st of April.
> Q. In the early or middle or later part of the month?—A. Why, it seems to me it was about the middle of the month, if I recollect, sometime during April.
> Q. How long did you remain in Washington, at that time, Mr. Hines?—A. Why, I was in Washington almost continuously from February until June.
> Q. What was your business there?—A. Why I was called to Washington as a witness before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Senate Finance Committee of the Senate.
> Q. And how long did that necessitate your attendance at Washington?—A. Well, it necessitated my being there practically continuously.
> Q. When did you cease to be a witness before that committee?—A. Well, directly, before the House committee sometime, if I recollect, in March.
> Q. March of 1909?—A. I think sometime during the spring.
> Q. And then did you appear as a witness before the Senate committee?—A. Yes.
> Q. Subsequently?—A. It was later, yes; some little time later.
> Q. And how long were you in attendance before the committee of the Senate as a witness?—A. Oh, directly as a witness, not over one or two days, I think.
> Q. When was the last time you appeared before either of those committees in the capacity of a witness?—A. I could not give the exact time, I do not recollect.
> Q. Approximately, about when?—A. Oh, I think it was sometime in April, if I recollect, March or April.
> Q. April, 1909?—A. The spring of 1909.
> Q. During the time you were in Washington, during February, March, or April, I assume you discussed the senatorial situation in Illinois, in a general sort of way?—A. No, I did not discuss that then until along in April.
> Q. And the men with whom you first discussed it were the two Senators whose names you have just mentioned?—A. I think they were the first men I discussed it with.
> Q. Now, tell the committee in a general way what the conversation was between you and Senator Aldrich and Senator PENROSE.—A. I think along in April Senator PENROSE asked me if I knew anything about whether or not the United States Senator would be elected from Illinois. He said he had heard some rumors that a deadlock would occur and no Senator would be elected. I told him I didn't know anything about the situation. He asked me then if I would try and find out the inward situation and the possibility of the different interests uniting upon some man and electing him. I told him I would. I inquired of several Congressmen then at the session, who apparently didn't know anything about the situation, and they said that Congressman LORIMER would probably know as much about it as anyone in Washington. I telephoned and made an engagement with Congressman LORIMER, at his office, and I asked him of the probability or possibility of the senate soon electing a Senator. He said——
> Mr. HENNECY. You mean the legislature?
> A. The legislature, yes. He said, as I recollect, that there were several interests that apparently could not unite at that time on the Senator, and that he was unable to tell me anything definite. He said he was going to Springfield in a day or two and would be back in Washington in the course of a week and possibly when he returned he would be able to tell me something more definite.

Mr. HEALY. Can you fix the time of that conversation, Mr. Hines?—A. Why, I think that was along in April, that is from memory; I just got my memory for it.

Q. Do you remember in what part of the month it was?—A. Why, it seems to me it was about the middle of April. I am not positive just about the dates or weeks of the situation. I saw the Congressman then upon his return from Springfield, and he told me no new developments had occurred and the conditions were about the same. I think he—yes; about the same. The Senators again asked me about the matter and I told them what Congressman LORIMER had stated. Then he went back to Springfield again—I think a matter of a few days and returned again—and I asked him the question if anything new had occurred. He said no. Then I asked him several names that I had heard in the general gossip around Washington that had been considered for Senator, and he told me that there didn't seem to be any likelihood of any of those names being decided upon, harmonized upon. I asked him whether he could become a candidate, whether the interests could unite upon him——

Q. Whether what?—A. Whether he could become a candidate, whether the different conflicting interests would be united on him. He said no; he was not a candidate and would not be a candidate. I told him that there was some rumors around Washington that he was a candidate. He said that he was not. Then I suggested Congressman Boutell, from Chicago—suggested his name as a possible Republican candidate that they could unite upon. I asked the Congressman would he be friendly to Congressman Boutell, and I think he stated that his relations had always been reasonably friendly with Boutell and he had many traits that might make him a desirable candidate. He asked me why I suggested his name, and I told him that he had been recommended as being a man that would be received favorably by the administration at Washington. Upon his return from Springfield, possibly a few days later, maybe a week, he said it appeared as if they could not unite on Boutell. Later, just only a short time, Senator Aldrich sent for me and stated that the administration, President Taft, was very anxious for a Senator to be elected from Illinois at the earliest date possible, and wanted to know if some influence could not be brought to bear on Congressman LORIMER to become a candidate; that he had understood that if he became a candidate that he could not be elected.

Now, in the testimony the word "not," in the phrase "that he could not be elected," I think is a manifest error. I call attention to it. "That he could be elected," I think, is the way the witness gave his testimony; otherwise it would be meaningless.

I told him I would see the Congressman upon his return to Washington. I talked to him. He would not commit himself. He said he had stated he would not be a candidate and had so given out to a number of his friends and could not say he would become a candidate.

Q. About when was that, Mr. Hines?—A. That was some time during April. It seems to me it was along toward the last of the month. It may have been early in May. I am not positive about the time. He left then in a day or two for Springfield. I think this session was early in May the more I recollect the time.

Then Senator Aldrich came to me and told me that President Taft was very anxious to have Congressman LORIMER become a candidate and do all he could to be elected at the earliest date possible; that the tariff bill, so-called Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, was then up in the Senate, there was very strong probability of their being able to pass it through the Senate, and it was very necessary to have a Senator from Illinois elected at the earliest date possible. He asked me if I would not immediately get in communication with Congressman LORIMER over the long-distance telephone, and impress upon his mind that the President was anxious to have him become a candidate and do all he could to be elected. I went to the long-distance telephone some time between 12 and 1 o'clock in the morning and called up from Washington Congressman LORIMER on the long-distance telephone, and told him at Springfield——

Q. Where did you call him up, at Springfield?—A. From Washington.

Q. From Washington to what point?—A. Springfield. And told him at length the request that the President had made through Senator Aldrich. We had quite a conversation over the telephone. He told me all the details about it, and I explained to him. Then he asked me—

Now, Senators, mark this, because, if an investigation is ordered by the Senate, I am convinced that some other testimony upon this very point, quite illuminating in its character, can be put into the record by a committee of the United States Senate with full powers—

Then he asked me—

He, LORIMER, from Springfield, at the time of this midnight conversation—

he asked me to telegraph him the substance of my conversation over the telephone in a night message, which I did, sent him a telegram practically stating the substance of the conversation over the telephone. That telegram was sent some time in the early part of May or the middle of May. I have not got the exact date, but I can get a copy of the telegram.

No one, I digress for a moment to say, can doubt that Mr. Hines is stating what occurred, because he purposes to verify it with the record of the telegraph company. That he had such a conversation with LORIMER is extremely probable; and that he can verify that fact by the record of the telegraph office, if their messages are not already destroyed, is also highly probable. That such a message was sent to WILLIAM LORIMER by Edward Hines from Washington I think there can be no doubt.

Mr. President, I choose to say at this time I do not think it is any proof whatever that the President was interfering in this matter, but I do think that there was a scheme to "put Mr. LORIMER over" at Springfield, and that all those who were concerned in it understood that if the name and sanction of the President could be used with Republican members of the legislature there it would have great influence. If a committee is ever raised to make this investigation, and it does its work as a committee of the Senate should, I believe it will be found that there was a telegram shown in which President Taft's name was used; shown under stipulations of and under seals of confidence, as though there was something sacred about it; shown in rooms behind locked doors and drawn blinds. I believe it will be found that that telegram helped to pull into line for the candidacy of WILLIAM LORIMER Republican members of the Legislature of Illinois who could not be reached by other methods and who could not be prevailed upon by any argument to support him.

Then he asked me to telegraph him the substance of my conversation over the telephone in a night message, which I did; sent him a telegram practically stating the substance of the conversation over the telephone. That telegram was sent some time in the early part of May or the middle of May. I have not got the exact date, but I can get a copy of the telegram. At that time he didn't promise to become a candidate, did not commit himself. He said he would give the subject consideration. I saw him then; then I saw him once after that before he became a candidate, before he was elected, in Washington. I am not positive of it, but it runs in my mind that he came back to Washington, and I saw him before he became a candidate. I think just a very short time prior to his election Senator Aldrich came to me again and stated that the President was very nervous about the situation in Illinois; that he had been notified or had been advised that the legislature would adjourn without electing the United States Senator; that they were very anxious to have a Republican elected from Illinois, and wanted me to see Congressman LORIMER and see if he could be elected Senator from the State before the legislature adjourned. They asked me to take the train and come to Springfield and meet him.

Q. Pardon me a minute. Was that before the last conversation which you had with Congressman LORIMER at Washington?—A. No; that was after the conversation at Washington.

Q. In order to get it in the natural sequence of events, if you would tell the committee the conversation or the substance of the conversation which you had with Congressman LORIMER at Washington.—A. Why, it was very brief. I simply tried to impress upon him the conversation and the message that I had received from the President through Senator Aldrich and the others if he could be elected.

Q. Was anyone present at that conversation other than you and he?—A. No; it was in his office at Washington. His—no; nobody was present. Then, as I stated, I telegraphed Congressman LORIMER that I was leaving Washington for Springfield or Chicago. I arrived in Chicago in the morning, on the morning that he was elected. I got off of the train and went over to the bank and telephoned him on the long-distance telephone, and told him that I was going down to Springfield to see him and to carry the message from the President to impress upon those in Springfield that the administration wanted him to be elected United States Senator at the earliest moment possible. He told me that I could save time and accomplish the same purpose if I would call up Gov. Deneen on the long-distance telephone and acquaint him with the message I had from the President. I called up Gov. Deneen on the telephone in the neighborhood of half an hour afterwards and explained to Gov. Deneen my message from Washington. I then telephoned Senator LORIMER about 11 o'clock that day—and told him that I had talked with the governor, and told him what the governor stated, and I think that is practically all of my connection with it.

I ask Senators to keep that in mind—

Q. What did the governor say to you in that respect when you talked with him on the long-distance wire?—A. The governor stated, "Mr. Hines, how can I tell who I am talking to over the telephone, and also whether or not you are authorized to bring this message to me?" I told him that I was talking from the Continental Commercial National Bank, that Mr. George Reynolds, the president, was in the room—I was using the telephone, a box telephone, just a box telephone right off of the room—that I would call him to the telephone, who I understood he knew very well. I was a director in the bank. Mr. Reynolds could confirm that I was there. Then he said, "No; that is not necessary, Mr. Hines; I understand your voice now, and will accept this for granted," practically those words.

Q. And is that substantially all as you recall it that you had to do or did do in connection with this matter?—A. Why, in a general way, yes. I think, in a general way, yes.

Q. You mean, that is all you now recall?—A. Just at this moment, yes.

Q. During any of those times, Mr. Hines, did you confer in any way or talk with any of the members of the general assembly?—A. I talked with one, I recollect.

Q. With whom did you talk?—A. Either a gentleman of the name—either a senator or house member, by the name of Stewart, from Aurora. I can not just recollect his initials.

Q. When did you talk with him?—A. Why, it was some time—it seems to me it was some time during April or May; I am not positive what month.

Q. Where were you when you talked with him?—A. In Chicago.

Q. And where was he?—A. He was in Chicago.

Q. You met him there?—A. Yes.

Q. By previous arrangement?—A. I think it was through appointment through his uncle at Washington, who was a former Congressman and a lumber acquaintance of mine.

Q. What talk did you have with Mr. Stewart on that occasion?—A. I met his uncle, of the firm of Alexander Stewart Lumber Co., of Wausau, Wis., and who has a winter home in Washington, and whom I used to see almost every day there, and I explained to him how anxious the administration seemed to be to get this deadlock in Illinois settled. He said his nephew was a member of either the house or senate, I am not certain which, and he said he was a Hopkins man, and I think he suggested, if I was going to Chicago, that he would like to have me meet his nephew, and I believe he made the appointment by wire, and I met his nephew in Chicago and discussed with him the condition in Springfield. He told me that he had pledged or promised he would vote for Senator Hopkins. We discussed the possibilities of Hopkins not being elected or a deadlock occurring, and I told him I had been trying to have Congressman LORIMER become a candidate, and I asked him if he would become a candidate would he support him, and I think he told me he could not do so consistently; that he had given his word and promise to either Senator Hopkins or Hopkins's manager or associate, and that he could not very well change. I think that is the substance of the conversation with him.

Q. And was he the only member with whom you discussed that matter?—A. I think he was the only member with whom I discussed it, to my knowledge.

Q. Did you send anyone to any one of the members of the general assembly for the purpose of discussing the matter of the senatorial election with them?—A. No; I didn't send anyone, to my recollection.

Q. Anyone in your employ or anyone else whom you now recall?—A. No; nobody in my employ. Now, let me see. I think I telephoned either from Chicago or Washington to a gentleman at Rock Island—I think it was Rock Island.

Q. What was the name of that gentleman?—A. Samuel Davis.

Q. When did you telephone to him?—A. Well, it was along about that same period.

Q. And what was the substance of that telephone conversation?—A. That the administration was very anxious to end the deadlock in Illinois, and that it appeared as if Senator Hopkins could not be elected, and unless some compromise candidate would be elected or there would be no Senator elected at this session, and that the administration leaders were anxious to have a Republican elected at the earliest date possible, and I think I asked him if he could request the members that he was acquainted with in that district to that import. I don't know who they were.

Q. Who is Mr. Davis?—A. He is a manufacturer of—that is, he is connected with—I think he is president of a large manufacturing concern in Rock Island, manufacturing farm machinery.

Q. How long have you known him?—A. Oh, I have known him in the neighborhood of 15 years.

Q. Did he report to you subsequently that he had seen any of the members of the house or senate from Rock Island?—A. No; he did not say he had. I think he said he would see them.

Q. He never reported to you after that?—A. No; I don't think so.

Q. Did you ever receive any word from him through any other person that he had seen the members of that district?—A. No; I only talked with him. I talked with no one else in that section.

Q. My question is, Did he send word to you through any other person?—A. No.

Q. Subsequently?—A. I don't think he did; I don't think of any.

Q. You have no recollection of that, if you did receive such word?—A. No.

Q. During this time, Mr. Hines, were you in Springfield at all?—A. No.

Q. Did you visit Springfield at any time during the legislative session at which Senator LORIMER was elected?—A. I have not been in Springfield for five years until to-day.

Q. And is it your recollection that all your communications with Springfield were from the Washington end of the line on the telephone?—A. No; I telephoned from Chicago before he was elected.

Q. Yes; one conversation you had with Senator LORIMER was from Chicago.—A. I had two conversations that morning; one with Gov. Deneen.

Q. Did you telephone from any other place or section of the country to Springfield?—A. No.

Q. During this time did you spend all of your time at Chicago and Washington? I refer now to the months of February, March, April, and May, 1909.—A. From my memory—to the best of my memory—yes; between Chicago and Washington.

Q. Were you in Duluth during that time?—A. Why, I don't think I was; I might have been; I don't think I was. I frequently go to Duluth, but I don't——

Q. You have no recollection of being up there during that period?—A. No; not during March, April, or May.

Q. Well, were you there shortly after May, 1909?—A. Oh, I think so.

Q. Did you communicate with anyone in reference to the senatorial situation in Illinois or Duluth?—A. No.

Q. At any time?—A. No.

Q. By telephone or otherwise?—A. No.

Q. When you had these talks with Senators Aldrich and Penrose and those other men at Washington, did they express any opposition to any of the men who were aspirants for the position of Senator from Illinois?—A. Why, their discussion was not along such lines, if I recollect. Their discussion was along the lines of having some one elected.

Q. Well, did they express any opposition to anyone—Senator Hopkins or any other candidate before the general assembly?—A. I don't think we discussed that phase of the situation at all.

Q. You have no recollection?—A. No recollection.

Q. Of such a talk with any of those men?—A. No.

Q. Did any of those men offer to aid in any way the selection of a Senator from Illinois?—A. In what way do you mean aid?

Q. Aid in any way? Aid financially or politically, or by using their influence or anything of that sort?—A. Not in any way financially, no; that subject was not discussed.

Q. You had no talk with anyone in Washington or the eastern portion of the country?—A. No; absolutely none.

Q. With reference to financial aid, volunteer to affect in any way the senatorial situation in Illinois?—A. Absolutely no.

Q. With Senator Aldrich or anyone else?—A. Absolutely no.

Q. Did you ever discuss with anyone, Mr. Hines, the question of raising money to aid the election of Senator LORIMER or anyone else for that position?—A. Absolutely no.

Q. Have you any knowledge or information with reference to anyone or any person who did aid or solicit funds for the purpose of affecting that situation?—A. Absolutely no.

Q. And never heard that matter discussed in Washington or elsewhere?—A. No.

Q. In Washington or elsewhere?—A. No.

Q. Do you know of any money having been raised to be used in that campaign?—A. No.

Q. Either before or after the election of Senator LORIMER?—A. No.

Q. Did you personally solicit or receive a fund or funds to be used in connection with the election of Senator LORIMER?—A. I did not.

Q. Did anyone for you?—A. No.

Q. Did you ever hear that matter discussed?—A. No.

Q. Did you ever discuss it with anyone?—A. No; except with the newspapers.

Q. Did you ever direct anyone or authorize anyone for you or anyone?—A. No.

Q. To solicit funds to be used for that purpose?—A. No.

Q. Have you any information at this time outside of what you may have received from newspapers that a sum of money was raised or used to aid in the election of Mr. LORIMER?—A. No; I have none.

Q. Did you personally, or your firm, contribute any money for that purpose?—A. Not a dollar, sir.

Q. And you never knew of such a fund being raised?—A. No.

Q. Did anyone ever approach you, Mr. Hines?—A. No.

Q. For the purpose of enlisting your financial aid?—A. No.

Q. In the matter of the election of a United States Senator from the State of Illinois?—A. No.

Q. And you never approached any other person?—A. No.

Q. Do you know of any money that was raised or solicited in any way after the election, Mr. Hines?—A. No, sir.

Q. And which was to be used to defray certain expense which has been incurred in the matter of his election?—A. No.

Q. You say you are a director of the Continental & Commercial Bank?—A. Yes.

Q. How long have you been identified with that bank, Mr. Hines?—A. Why, about 5 years as a director; as a depositor, for 15 years.

Q. Did you do business with any other bank than the Continental?—A. Yes.

Q. What other banks do you do business with?—A. The Hibernian National Bank.

Q. Of Chicago?—A. Yes. The Corn Exchange National Bank, the Fort Dearborn National Bank, the Northern Trust Co., the Graham & Sons Co., and another bank—I just can't recollect its name. It is a small bank that we use for our pay rolls on the West Side. I think it is Blue Island National; I think it is. It is a small bank. * * *

Q. Will you tell the committee the names of the different companies with which you are identified, Mr. Hines?—A. There is the Virginia & Rainy Lake Lumber Co.—that is a Virginia company; the Northwest Lumber & Manufacturing Co., the White River Lumber Co., the Iron River Lumber Co., the Champion Lumber Co., Wisconsin Mill Co., Lincoln Street Milling Co. I think that is all. I can not just recollect them all.

Q. I assume these are all lumber companies, or are affiliated in some way with the lumber trade?—A. Yes. * * *

Q. Have you ever heard directly or indirectly, Mr. Hines, except through the columns of the newspapers, of a collection of a fund of money in and around the city of Chicago, or in other parts of the State of Illinois, which was to be used in any way in connection with the senatorial election of May, 1909?—A. No, sir.

Q. Nobody ever discussed that matter with you?—A. No.

Q. And you never talked with anyone about it?—A. No.

Q. And you never contributed any sum of money to that purpose?—A. No.

Q. And have you any knowledge about any person?—A. No.

Q. Or corporation who did so contribute money?—A. Never heard it discussed.

Q. And you have no information which you can give the committee on that subject?—A. Absolutely, no.

Q. Either personal information or information which you have obtained through others?—A. No.

Q. Do you know of anyone connected with any of your various companies, or associated with you in any way, who was instrumental in raising such a fund as I have described?—A. Nobody would have any authority.

Q. Do you know of any person——A. No; they would not have any authority.

Q. Who did?—A. No.

Q. And in the various discussions which you have detailed to the committee—over the telephone and otherwise—was the question of money ever discussed?—A. No, no.

Q. And you have no information, I assume, with reference to the raising of money in the eastern section of the country.—A. Never heard——

Q. To be used for that purpose?—A. Never heard it discussed nor discussed it with anyone.

Q. And you don't know of any money having been sent from there to Springfield or Chicago or any other place in the State of Illinois?—A. No.

Q. To be used for that purpose?—A. No.

Q. Do you know of any attempt being made in any part of Illinois to raise money to be used in conjunction with the senatorial election of this State?—A. Never heard of it.

Q. Either before or after the election of Senator LORIMER?—A. Never heard of it.

Q. And you had nothing to do with such an effort?—A. No.

Q. If one there was?—A. No.

Q. And you have no information along that line which you can give the committee?—A. No.

Q. Did anyone ever approach you and solicit you to subscribe to such a fund?—A. No.

Q. At any time?—A. No.

Q. Or any place?—A. No.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to say just this, in conclusion, concerning Mr. Hines's testimony: Edward Hines was to be seen in the Senators' gallery day after day from the beginning of the last session to the end. He lunched at the Senate restaurant. He haunted the Marble Room and waylaid Senators at every turn. He was brazen and impudent in his work. He secured letters of introduction from prominent lumbermen and made or attempted to make capital for LORIMER of such friendly offices. How he was received in all cases I do not know, but I do know that he met deserved rebuke in some.

As the day approached for the calling up of this resolution Hines is again found on duty, making himself busy about the Capitol.

Sir, I want to say to the Senate of the United States and to the country that Edward Hines is not a raw hand at this business, though his work is often rank and coarse. During another protracted senatorial contest, which was likewise involved in scandal, his henchmen were notoriously active for the successful candidate. When all honest men were in doubt as to the final outcome, one of Hines's agents boastfully foretold days in advance the hour of the election and the exact result.

His principal agent, who was a resident of Wisconsin, has not dared to remain since that time within the borders of the State.

Mr. President, I refer to that subject with personal regret. Any part that I have taken in this matter I have been prompted by no personal feelings and no ulterior motives. I believe that influences are at work in this country which are undermining the Government that our fathers gave to us, and I believe it to be the duty of every man who cares for the perpetuity of free institutions to raise his voice and stand without flinching against this thing, which is everywhere eating into the very life of representative government.

I now ask the attention of the Senate a little further to this testimony. Christian F. Wiehe is a brother-in-law of Hines. I referred to him and quoted in part some testimony from him yesterday upon another point. I again remind the Senate that Wiehe is secretary and director of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. He also admitted to the committee that he heard Mr. Hines conversing with some one at Springfield over the long-distance telephone from the Grand Pacific Hotel on the day that LORIMER was elected. He admitted having gone at midnight to the Grand Pacific Hotel on another occasion, at Mr. Hines's request, to warn Mr. Cook and Mr. O'Brien to keep out of the way of a subpœna of the grand jury. He entered a general denial of any participation in or knowledge of a corruption fund for the election of LORIMER.

Wiehe admitted that during the month of May, 1909, Hines called him up from Washington on the long-distance telephone and asked him to telephone to Senator LORIMER and "let him know that the administration is with him." Wiehe did so. LORIMER on that occasion was at Springfield.

Wiehe testified that he had a number of talks with Hines concerning LORIMER's election, on the long-distance telephone and otherwise.

Concerning the long-distance telephone that Hines had with "the governor"—I use the words "the governor" in quotation marks here, because I believe all the testimony shows beyond any question, Senators, that when Hines was telephoning from Mr. Cook's room in the Grand Pacific Hotel the morning of the day that LORIMER was elected, he was talking to LORIMER. To my mind, the testimony absolutely clinches that matter. Of course this case does not depend upon that by any means, but if that fact is proven it connects LORIMER with the corruption and makes him a party to it, because it was stated over the telephone at that time, "Go ahead"—I am not quoting the exact words—"money plenty; use every effort; leave no stone unturned."

Hines is using every effort possible to make it appear that they were talking with somebody called "the governor" at that time, and that it was not LORIMER, for there is proof by living witnesses that money connected with this election was discussed over a telephone wire on that day, and the best they can do is to get LORIMER out of it, if possible, and make it appear that it was somebody else at the other end of the wire.

Cook and O'Brien were present in the room; they heard the Hines end of that telephone conversation. They heard the word "governor," and that is how they got the notion that he was talking with the governor. That is the explanation of it, so far as they are concerned, because, when they came to talk about it afterwards, one of them says that he thought it was Gov. Deneen, and the other says that he thought he was talking with ex-Gov. Yates.

Following is the testimony of Wiehe, the brother-in-law of Hines, who was also present during that telephone conversation of Hines from the Grand Pacific Hotel:

Q. Well, will you tell the committee what the conversation was?—A. Why, the conversation was substantially or practically as follows: "I have just talked with the governor on the long-distance telephone"—

This is what Hines said to the man at the other end of the line—

"and he assures me he will do what you ask. You know that the administration—you know what the administration wants. Now, leave no stone unturned to be elected. I will get down to Springfield, if necessary, in the morning." And when he got through talking he turned to the people in the room and he said: "I have just been talking to Senator LORIMER." * * *

That is Wiehe's statement of who the telephone conversation was with. The other two men who were in the room say that Hines made mention of money; that he would be on hand with any amount of money necessary.

Q. How soon after you gentlemen went to Mr. Cook's room before Mr. Hines was called up on the telephone?—A. I would not attempt to say how long. It was—we were in there a little while discussing matters, and this call came. Just the time I do not——

Q. Who went to the telephone first?—A. Well, I don't know.

Q. You have no recollection of that?—A. No.

Q. But you do recall very distinctly the conversation which Mr. Hines had over the wire?—A. Well, I recall that portion of it; yes.

Wiehe told the committee that Hines had been at the Continental Bank immediately before coming to the Grand Pacific Hotel.

We come now to another phase of the case. Concerning the midnight visit he made to the Grand Pacific Hotel, to warn Cook and O'Brien to evade subpœnas, Wiehe's testimony is as follows:

Q. Well, what was the occasion of your meeting them at that time, Mr. Wiehe?—A. Why, Mr. Hines—somebody had informed him that Cook and O'Brien were to be subpœnaed before the grand jury, and at that time Mr. Hines, owing to his relations with the administration, their asking him to act as a messenger and see Gov. Deneen, he did not feel as if he wanted that disclosed at that time, and he asked me to go down and see Mr. Cook and O'Brien and ask them to keep out of the way until this thing was over.

Wiehe said he got a message from Hines that night, when he got home from the theater, to call him up on the telephone. Wiehe did so.

Q. I wish you would tell us just exactly what Mr. Hines said, as you now recall it, the telephone message that he gave you.—A. He asked me to go down and see Cook and O'Brien, who were at the Grand Pacific Hotel, and ask them to keep out of the way, on account of this grand jury investigation that he thought was pending. * * *

Q. Well, do you know why Mr. Hines was interested in keeping witnesses out of the jurisdiction of the grand jury?—A. Well, he thought he was—he would probably be drawn into this matter.

Q. Do you know why he thought he would be drawn into the matter?—A. Well, because a number of people had spoken to him about it, I suppose. I don't know why. He never said that to me.

Wiehe did not remember the name of the theater or the performance he attended that night and he volunteered the opinion that his midnight trip of two miles across the city was a "foolish" proceeding.

Wiehe said:

I told them that Hines had called me up—I thought it was perfect nonsense for him to do it—but he called me up and I went down to tell them what he said.

Wiehe denied that he had any further talk with Cook and O'Brien that night, but, later on in the hearing, when he was asked if he recalled making the statement that "Mr. Hines talked too much," he replied, "I may have made that statement; yes."

Wiehe added: "Mr. Hines felt that he did elect LORIMER," and that "the reason he thought that, was that he had requested Gov. Deneen to throw the support to LORIMER, and Deneen said he would do it, and immediately following that Mr. LORIMER was elected, and Mr. Hines supposed that he had assisted in electing him."

Wiehe said Hines had told him about talking to Gov. Deneen on the long-distance telephone at the Continental & Commercial National Bank on the morning of the day that LORIMER was elected.

Q. And, so far as you know, that is the only conversation he ever had with Gov. Deneen?—A. As far as I know, yes.

This conversation, Wiehe testified, occurred between the time that Hines left the Pennsylvania-Washington Special, upon its arrival in Chicago, and the time he came over to the Grand Pacific Hotel to meet Cook and O'Brien late that morning.

Now, Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senate to another feature of this case, from the testimony taken by the Illinois senate committee. Mr. Kohlsaat, it will be remembered, informed the committee that his information about a $100,000 fund had come from Mr. Funk, the general manager of the International Harvester Co. Edward Hines had said to Mr. Funk at their meeting in the Union League Club that a hundred thousand dollar fund had been raised to secure LORIMER's election; and that it had been underwritten in a hurry—I am not giving the exact words, but just the substance to connect this up—that he was going about soliciting money enough to make up that amount; that he was collecting from people who, he thought, would be interested in having LORIMER in the Senate; and that the Harvester Co., he felt, ought to pay about $10,000.

The proposition was refused by Mr. Funk, but in the course of the conversation Hines said that contributions were to be sent to Ed. Tilden, president of the National Packing Co., of Chicago, and a stockholder and director in banking and other corporations. Tilden was named in Mr. Funk's testimony as the person to whom Hines said contributions to the $100,000 fund should be sent. Mr. Funk stated this, when pressed by the committee, a little bit reluctantly—as I think the record shows. The committee then subpœnaed Mr. Tilden. I quote just briefly from the testimony of Mr. Tilden. When questioned by the investigating committee on April 13, he objected to the inspection of his banking account by the committee. He said:

I claim that there is nothing, and I am here under oath, and I claim that there is nothing in these accounts that in any way has any connection with the matter under investigation by this committee. And I do not think it is fair of the committee to compel a man to come in here and show his private transactions with his customers, his clients, and corporations he represents, and estates that he represents, and his own personal and household expenses. * * *

Q. Well, this subpœna, Mr. Tilden, calls for the production by you of all books which will show the receipts and disbursements of moneys, by you in the year 1909, during the months of June, July, August, and September, whether by you personally, as trustee or otherwise, together with all canceled checks, signed by you during that period. Also all other letters and memoranda received by you at that time, bearing upon the question of the election or selection of a United States Senator from Illinois, and which said election occurred in May, 1909. Have you any objection to complying with the terms of that subpœna at some subsequent hearing of the committee?—A. Yes.

William T. Abbott, vice president of the Central Trust Co. of Illinois, representing this bank, declined to furnish the investigating committee a certified copy of the account of Mr. Tilden for the period of time under investigation. In a lengthy explanation he said that the officers of that bank believed that "no foundation has been laid which warrants the committee in requiring us to produce those documents." He admitted that the only information they had as to whether the evidence before the committee was "relevant and material" enough to cause them to obey the committee subpœna was gathered from newspaper reports.

Q. When will you determine, Mr. Abbott, when that information shall be relevant and material? And from what particular newspaper would you take your information in that respect?

Mr. Abbott declined to indicate his "preference for my morning's reading" and declined to produce the account of Mr. Tilden "at this time."

On April 20, one week after Edward Tilden had testified before the Helm committee, Mr. William A. Bradford appeared before the committee as Mr. Tilden's representative, and presented a letter and an affidavit, both signed by Edward Tilden. In his letter Mr. Tilden says:

In regard to my private papers, accounts, etc.—

I am taking particular pains to lay before the Senate all of the substance of the defense of Mr. Tilden for not producing his books—

I wish to repeat, as I stated to you in Springfield, that it is manifestly unfair to attempt to compel me to expose any private transactions to public view, when such private matters bear no relevancy to the subject matter of your investigation. My affidavit specifically states that I have never had in my possession or have I ever had any knowledge of any papers or documents which relate either directly or indirectly to the election which you are investigating. I sincerely hope that you will see the justice of my position and not require any further response from me.

That tends to raise the presumption, you know, that the entries in the books would describe just what was to be done with the money paid out under a particular check.

Mr. Tilden then offers in his letter to designate a member of the Helm committee to examine the papers and accounts in question. In his affidavit he makes sweeping denial of participation in or knowledge of the receipt or disbursements of money in connection with LORIMER's election.

Chairman Helm then read a communication from the vice president of the Drovers' Savings Bank, of which Edward Tilden is president, saying that "we understand that in the present instance Mr. Tilden is making to your committee a statement which obviates the difficulty presented," said difficulty being a subpœna served upon the cashier of the bank, Mr. Cummings, directing them to produce for the committee all the accounts of Edward Tilden.

Upon the refusal of Tilden and the bank officials to obey the subpœnas of the committee and produce the documentary proof sought, the committee reported such refusal to the State senate. The State senate then ordered that these men be arrested and brought before the bar of the senate and required to show cause why they should not produce the documentary proof demanded. Whereupon the senate caused warrants to be issued against these witnesses. The witnesses were arrested, but immediately secured their release under writs of habeas corpus issued by Judge Petit, of the Circuit Court of Cook County, who, after a hearing, denied the right of the committee and the State senate to require the attendance of Tilden and Benedict and Cummings or the production of their books. These witnesses were thereupon discharged. The investigating committee was unable to probe further into Tilden's relation to Hines or the Lorimer election. In fact, this act of Judge Petit put an end to the Helm committee's investigation of the corruption fund.

Prior to that time, however, the committee had taken some testimony relative to the distribution of this $100,000 fund. That testimony, Mr. President, is very important and material in its bearing upon the question of whether the Senate shall make an investigation. I will give it only briefly and will ask leave to print such portions of this synopsis and the quotations that I have made from the testimony as do not, it seems to me, need to be read at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator make the request now?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I make the request now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? No objection is heard, and the request is granted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This digest I am to present contains—

First. Testimony of former State Senator Jandus, friend and legal representative of Senator Broderick, admitting he was present in Broderick's saloon when, it is charged, money was distributed; also admitting purchasing Montana lands in 1909 which cost him $5,500; also claiming he kept at the time over $5,000, mostly in hundred-dollar bills, in a little tin box in his office; also revealing total failure to remember from whom he got this large amount of currency; also showing that he deposited in his bank on June 5, 1909, $3,010, more than twice as much as was deposited on any other one day in the year; also claiming that, although attorney for 15 building and loan associations, still he kept absolutely no books in his office; also declaring that the bank stub books requested by the committee had been lost.

Second. Testimony of Assemblyman McMackin, admitting that he holds 50 shares of stock in Senator LORIMER's new bank in Chicago; also admitting that he could not state definitely the name of the person with whom he arranged for the purchase of this stock.

Third. Testimony of Assemblyman Blair, admitting that shortly after LORIMER's election he had over $600 in currency with him at a baseball game, was drunk, and was betting on the game—this in spite of the fact that Blair was in debt and had a mortgage on his home.

Fourth. Testimony of Mr. Taylor that he had heard a member of the legislature, L. E. York, tell some people that while there was no money offered, nevertheless jobs were offered.

Fifth. Testimony of former United States Senator Hopkins and Mr. Peffer, Hopkins's private secretary, and Senator McCormick. Hopkins and Peffer say McCormick told Peffer he had been offered $2,500 to vote for LORIMER; McCormick denies he had ever been approached with such an offer.

Sixth. Testimony of Assemblyman Campbell that a Lorimer representative had offered him a job if he would change his vote from Hopkins to LORIMER.

Mr. President, I now call attention to the testimony of Cyril Jandus, another member of the Illinois Legislature whose name is new to the Senate, but whose testimony is so remarkable that I feel compelled to read it. I think it strongly suggests that if we start upon another inquiry, with all the power of the Senate behind it, a searching and thorough-going inquiry, we shall then come to know much more about this case than we ascertained as a result of the last investigation. I shall not be surprised, Mr. President, if a thorough-going investigation shall reveal the fact that a fund was raised and used nearly double, or somewhat more than double, the figures that have been mentioned in this connection. I know how hazardous it is to make prediction, but I venture to predict that, if there is ever a thorough-going investigation of this case, a mine of facts will be opened up to the Senate and to the public more shocking than anything that has yet been revealed.

Jandus, of Chicago, is an important witness in the matter of the distribution of a corruption fund to elect LORIMER. He is described by the Helm investigating committee in its report to the State senate as follows:

The evidence shows that Jandus was then, and for a long time had been, a close friend of Broderick and was his legal representative.

Senators who were here in the Sixty-first Congress will remember Broderick. Broderick was a State senator who kept a saloon in which Mr. Holstlaw stated he received his share of the boodle fund. Jandus is chief deputy in the probate clerk's office in Chicago, where he has been since December, 1910. He is one of the Democrats who voted on the final ballot for WILLIAM LORIMER. He admitted being present at Broderick's saloon in June, 1909, when Holstlaw was there. He testified it was the first time he had met Holstlaw in Broderick's saloon. He said that he kept only one bank account, and that was in the Caspar State Bank; that he never kept a safety-deposit box, but that he had a little tin box in his office. He admitted purchasing lands in Montana in the year 1909, his own share of which cost him $5,500.

Q. About when was it that you bought those lands?—A. I think I made the agreement in—or started to deal with Three Forks Land Co. in April. * * * And finally signed up the agreement some time in May (1909). * * *

Q. And when was the transaction consummated or closed?—A. Entirely closed some time in July; that is——

Q. July?—A. That is the balance; some money paid.

Q. And how much money do you say you paid for that land?—A. Well, we paid down $20,000 all together, so I put up $5,500 of my own.

Q. You had some associates in that transaction?—A. Yes.

Q. And your share of the purchase was a little over one-fourth of the purchase price paid?—A. Yes; just a little over $5,500; we owe still on that over $19,000, some of which I am on the note in the State Bank of Chicago.

Q. How much money did you pay in the summer of 1909 on account of this particular transaction?—A. Well, as I recollect it, I—if my memory serves me right—I first put down some time in May a thousand dollars as a sort of option on it, and then I think I had 10 days' time or something like that——

Q. Was that thousand dollars your own money?—A. Yes.

Q. Was that paid by check or currency?—A. By check, I paid it, if my recollection is right, I paid all three checks—the same as that—I gave them three checks, I believe. Then about 10 days or so afterwards I had to put up $5,000, and then I got, I think, a little over a month's time to scrape $14,000.

Q. Well, how much of that $5,000 payment did you make?—A. I made part of it; I made, I believe, $3,000 of it, and two other parties put up a thousand each at that time.

Q. And was that $3,000 payment in currency or cash?—A. I made that in check, I guess.

Q. I mean in currency or check.—A. Check.

Q. Check. Now, you say you made a third payment?—A. Yes; after the sum was scraped up.

Q. And how much was that third payment?—A. I paid twenty-five hundred dollars first, a thousand of which I paid for one of the men who had given me it to pay for him; then he afterwards sold it to one of the others. He held it for some time.

Q. So that the total payment was a $2,500 payment?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it was by your check on the bank?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And of that amount fifteen hundred dollars represented your own money?—A. Fifty-five hundred dollars.

Q. Well, I am talking about the twenty-five hundred dollars.—A. Yes; that was my own money.

Q. And the thousand dollars was money you received from another man?—A. Yes. * * *

Q. That $3,000 payment made at that time represented, as I understand it, your own money?—A. Yes.

Q. That $3,000—where did you obtain that $3,000, Mr. Jandus, do you know?—A. Oh, I have had money; possibly in the neighborhood of $5,000 at that time; had it ready to pay some loan.

Q. Where did you have it?—A. I had it ready to pay some loan.

Q. Where did you have it?—A. I had it in my box in the vault in my office.

Q. In the office?—A. In the private office.

Q. You carried the currency in the box?—A. I did not carry it; I had it there.

Q. Yes. How much currency did you carry in that office?—A. Over five thousand at that time; I think it was fifty-two or three hundred I had there at that time.

Q. And you took from your box in the vault this $3,000?—A. I do not recollect just how I did that, because I have money coming in all the time; I make all kinds of deposits from loans being made by building and loans, for I am attorney of 15 building and loan associations, and private loans, and I don't know just how I did that.

Q. How long had you had this fifty-two hundred dollars or fifty-three hundred dollars in your box in the vault?—A. Well, in its entirety, I had not had it long, but gradually, whenever I could add a hundred or two, I have had there over a year——

Q. You carried during that time a bank account?—A. Yes, sir. * * *

Q. What were the denominations of those bills carried by you in your vault?—A. Well, pretty near all $100 bills, $50 bills. * * * Possibly more than half of it was in $100 bills.

Senators who remember the denomination of the money that these boodlers got from time to time will recognize that this gentleman was carrying, in his little tin box, bills of the same denomination as that known as the "jack pot" and the "Lorimer money."

Q. And how long had you had that fifty-two or fifty-three hundred dollars in the vault?—A. Well, that, the fifty-two or three hundred exactly, I don't know when I did add the last; always when I got a chance to add a hundred I put a hundred to it, but the money itself I have been carrying along in sums up there; kept it there pretty near two years.

Jandus testified that this money in the little tin box was kept in his safe, and that a man in his office besides himself had access to the safe.

Q. Now, your best recollection is that this $3,000 was drawn out about June, 1909?—A. Somewhere around there, I think it must have been, because it was about 10 days after the first payment of a thousand dollars.

Q. You took that $3,000, as I understand, over to the Caspar State Bank to deposit?—A. No; I don't know whether I took $3,000 out of there or whether it was other money received and not the money that I had in there.

Q. Well, the $3,000 which was the payment which you made on account of this Montana land purchase, as I understand it, was obtained by you from those funds which you carried in your office in the vault?—A. Well, not directly from that fund; I do not recollect whether that was true or not.

Q. Well, how did you make——A. Well, I might have had other money from some other people; I don't know.

Q. How did you make this $3,000 payment—by check or in cash?—A. By check.

Q. You say you might have had it from some other people?—A. Yes.

Q. You mean by that that it might have been the money of some of your clients?—A. Yes.

Q. And do you mean to say that you used it in connection with the purchase of this land in which you and your other three associates were interested?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, if that was the fact, did you replenish that fund subsequently?—A. Undoubtedly. * * *

Q. When did you do that?—A. I do not know; whenever it is necessary to repay the money out for the client.

Q. Do you have any recollection now of having received $3,000 from any of your clients?—A. No; I do not.

Q. In the month of May or June, 1909?—A. I do not recollect it.

Q. Did anybody pay you any such sum of money at that time?—A. Yes, they may have; I don't know.

Jandus's testimony brings out the fact that he was away from his office in almost constant attendance at the Illinois Legislature and that during his absence there were in his office a man who served as office boy, a stenographer, his office associate (Sindon), and a real estate man who rents a room there in the suite occupied by Jandus—yet Mr. Jandus felt no uneasiness about leaving in the little tin box the large sum of money he said was there. Mr. Jandus's deposit book for this period was shown in evidence, and on June 5, 1909, was recorded a deposit of $3,010. This is more than twice as large as any other daily deposit made during the year.

And yet Mr. Jandus, in spite of the fact that he admits that he is attorney for 15 building and loan associations, in spite of the fact that he admits his bank deposits for one year alone were about $16,000—still this man told the committee that he kept absolutely no books in his office, but carried accounts in his head or upon loose memoranda.

Q. Do you keep books of account, Mr. Jandus?—A. No.

Q. Have you ever kept any books of account?—A. Never; I have tried it several times; gave it up very shortly.

Q. Do you have any written memoranda or data of any kind in your office, or at your home or elsewhere, which indicate the amount of money received and disbursed by you from time to time?—A. I have not. * * *

Q. Do you have a pretty good recollection of the amount of moneys received and disbursed by you during the summer of 1909?—A. I have not

Mr. Jandus appeared at a subsequent meeting of the committee. He was questioned about the canceled checks covering the period in question which the committee had requested him to produce. The bank-stub books which the committee asked him to produce he said were undoubtedly "lost."

Q. Where were those books when you saw them last?—A. I do not recollect. I tell you honestly when I get through I generally cut off the ends and leave the stub there, and sometimes I might have carried it around in my pocket and——

Jandus said that he had made a search of his office for those books but was unable to find any of them.

Q. Your bank account in the month of June, 1909, Mr. Jandus, was unusually active as compared with the other period, with the other months, included in this period. Have you any explanation to make of that fact to the committee?—A. Only what I made the last time, that I was in that Montana deal and I deposited the money so I could pay it out by check.

C. L. McMackin, of Salem, Ill., is in the house-furnishing business and runs a general store; in addition, he is director in the Salem State Bank. He was a Republican member of the lower house of the Illinois Legislature and voted steadfastly for Mr. Hopkins for United States Senator on every ballot except the one that elected WILLIAM LORIMER, and on that ballot he changed his vote from Hopkins to LORIMER.

Q. What induced you to change your vote, Mr. McMackin?—A. Well, I was very much worn out and sick and tired about the deadlock, and I had made up my mind a long while before if there ever came a time when we could elect another Republican I would assist in doing it, and Mr. LORIMER suited me first rate.

Mr. McMackin admitted that he holds 50 shares of stock in Senator LORIMER's new bank in Chicago. He secured this stock when the bank was organized—"probably in May last, in 1910." He claimed that an error was made in making out the 50 shares in his name; that 10 of those shares were for Mr. B. M. Smith, the cashier of the Salem Bank, of which Mr. McMackin is a director; and that only 40 shares really applied to himself, although "the shares are all made out in one certificate." This error was not corrected on the records of Senator LORIMER's bank, but was "just fixed up between me and Mr. Smith."

Mr. McMackin was unable to tell the committee definitely the name of the person with whom he arranged for the purchase of this stock in LORIMER's bank. He said he had forgotten. Mr. McMackin's story of his purchase of the stock in LORIMER's bank is as follows:

I will tell you how that happened. Let's get right down to it. I got notice—I suppose a great many did—that this bank was going to be organized, and Mr. Smith (the cashier of the Salem State Bank, of which Mr. McMackin is a director) is a member of the Bankers' Association of the State, and I took this to him and asked him to please hold the matter up and see what he thought about investing in this stock, and he reported in a few weeks that the best he could get—he thought it would be all right, and that if I could get 10 shares he would like to have it. But then we subscribed for the stock.

Q. And subsequently purchased it?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMackin said he paid for this stock in two payments. In order to make the first payment he says he made a loan of the bank—his own bank at Salem—for $2,500. Mr. Smith's part of the stock represented $1,250, so a draft was sent to LORIMER's bank for $3,125. Before making the next payment McMackin borrowed $5,000 of Robert Martin, another director in the Salem State Bank.

Mr. McMackin testified that out of this $5,000 he paid back his loan of $2,500 to the Salem bank, and then met the other payment on his stock in LORIMER's bank. The second payment was made about two weeks after the first. McMackin said he had to pay only 5 per cent interest on his loan of $5,000 from Martin, and gave the committee to understand that he retired his loan of $2,500 from the Salem bank out of this other loan, because he had to pay 7 per cent at the bank. McMackin told the committee he still owed that $5,000 to Martin, evidenced by a note. McMackin denied that prior to the publication of White's confession he had ever heard rumors of the use of money in the senatorial election. He said:

I never heard, Mr. Healy, of the use of money; I never heard any talk of money; I never had the least suspicion, no cause for suspicion, to think money was being used.

William C. Blair, an attorney of Mount Vernon, Ill., and a Democratic member of the lower house of the last general assembly, admitted that he was at a baseball game in June, 1909, and had with him more than $600 in currency. Asked if he made any bets on the game, he replied, "Never bet on a game in my life." Asked if he pretended to bet, he replied, "I want to tell the square thing about it. I did have a little money up." Blair's testimony as to the happenings that day at the game is muddled. He admits that he was more or less drunk on that occasion. The fact that Blair carried with him to a baseball game so soon after the election of WILLIAM LORIMER a sum of money in excess of $600 is significant in the light of his own testimony regarding his personal finances. In the early part of the year 1909 he was in debt. He testified as follows:

I first borrowed from Albert Watson, the president of the bank. I went to him to get the loan, something like $400, I don't remember the amount; that is the best I can recall; and at the Third National Bank I was security there on a note for a hundred; and I had two hundred borrowed; and at the Jefferson bank I had some borrowed; but I do not—now I do not want to be quoted just as to the dates when I had this. I borrowed it out and they were kind to me, and I borrowed money at each bank.

Q. How much was your indebtedness to the Jefferson bank?—A. Well, that was not so much.

Q. Well, how much?—A. It is possibly a hundred dollars or more; I don't remember.

Q. Well, did you have any other indebtedness about that time, in the first half of the year 1909? * * *—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Can you approximate it?—A. Oh, I had a mortgage on my home, got it yet, of $1,300.

Blair testified that since the early part of 1909 he paid off part of his indebtedness, but denied that he got the money from any other source or place than "from the legislature and some law practice."

C. A. Taylor, of Harrisburg, Ill., testified that he heard one member of the legislature, L. E. York, tell a number of people in a drug store one evening in Harrisburg that he never got any money; there wasn't any money offered; but he said there were jobs offered. York voted for Mr. LORIMER. Taylor testified that "there was a good deal of censure of him [York] about it" down home.

Albert J. Hopkins, former United States Senator from Illinois, testified that Senator McCormick, of the Illinois Legislature, stated to Mr. Peffer, Hopkins's private secretary, that he, McCormick, had been approached with an offer to receive a sum of money in consideration of his vote for Mr. LORIMER, the sum named being twenty-five hundred dollars, according to Hopkins's remembrance.

Q. Who had he, McCormick, been supporting at that time?—A. Well, he had been supporting me, and he voted for me afterwards. He voted for me. But, as I now remember it, he was one of the seven that voted for Mr. LORIMER ultimately.

Hopkins was told of this conversation with McCormick by his private secretary, Peffer.

Regarding his conversation with Senator Landee, Hopkins testified:

Q. You have read Senator Landee's testimony given before the committee?—A. Yes.

Q. And your recollection of it is in harmony with that he said?—A. In substance; yes.

Q. He told you, as I recall his testimony, that Mr. Luke, a member of the house, had suggested to him that 10 Democratic votes could be obtained for you if you would do the right thing?—A. Yes.

Senators will remember that Luke, deceased at the time of the former investigation, was proven to have been present when "Lorimer money" was distributed among the confessed bribe takers and was proven to have had in his possession after the distribution substantially the same amount of money and in bills of the same denominations as the other "jack-pot" statesmen.

Hopkins said:

I told Senator Landee that I was not looking for Democratic votes; that I was a candidate for the Senate and not the penitentiary.

Hopkins testified as follows regarding a conversation he had with Johnson Lawrence, a member of the house:

Mr. Lawrence had been supporting me all the way through, and I learned the morning of the vote—somebody told me—that he was going to vote for Mr. LORIMER, and I could not believe him. He was in his seat in the house and I went and sat down beside him, and I had a talk with him and found that he was going to vote for Mr. LORIMER. And I remember I was somewhat exercised myself to think that he was going to leave me, and I told him that he could not justify himself before his people up there; that I knew them all; that they came from the same section where I was born and had lived, and he would not be justified in changing. But about all that he said to me was that he should vote for Mr. LORIMER. He did not state to me that he was getting any consideration for it.

Q. Well, did you state to him that he was getting money for his vote?—A. Well, I did not; no. I did not say that he was, but I told him that he could not make his people believe that he was not bought if he voted.

Q. Well, have you any information of any sort with reference to his having been approached along that line? * * *—A. No; any further than the reports that were going around about the use of money. And I used that as a basis of my remark to him.

John M. Peffer, of Aurora, secretary of the Merchants' Association, testified as follows regarding his conversation with Hopkins, which took place in the St. Nicholas Hotel, Springfield:

Q. What did you tell him (Senator Hopkins) on that occasion?—A. I told him that Senator McCormick had just told me a little while before that—maybe a matter of half an hour—that he had been offered money provided he would vote for Senator LORIMER.

Q. Did you tell the Senator how much money had been offered?—A. Well, I gave him the story just as I got it, which was to the effect Senator McCormick told me he had been offered $2,500 if he would vote for Senator LORIMER, and upon his refusal to do—to accept those terms and vote for LORIMER for that sum—he was told that he could name the amount which he would perform that service for.

Peffer testified this information he obtained from Senator McCormick himself in conversation in the lobby of the Illinois Hotel, in Springfield. It was within an hour afterwards that Peffer told of this conversation to Hopkins.

George F. McCormick, of Alton, senator from the forty-seventh district, was called to the stand. He denied that any man had ever offered him "a dollar to switch from Hopkins to LORIMER." He had voted steadfastly for Hopkins until the one hundred and eighth ballot, when he switched to LORIMER. He testified he knew Peffer well, and met him several different times in the Illinois Hotel, but said he had absolutely no recollection of telling Peffer that he had been approached, adding, "and I don't believe it ever happened."

Q. And you never told Mr. Peffer that such a suggestion had been made to you?—A. I think not; I—I am absolutely sure of it.

Q. You say you think not?—A. I say I am not——

Q. Is there some——A. Well, I will qualify it; I will say it never happened.

Q. * * * And you say under oath that you never told Mr. Peffer that such a suggestion had been made to you?—A. Never did.

McCormick denies it. But Holstlaw got $2,500. There is one expression here in the testimony of Jandus, who was a member of the senate, that indicates, to my mind, that the amount he received was $2,500. McCormick, a senator, according to the testimony of former Senator Hopkins and his private secretary, stated that he was offered $2,500. I think it is pretty clear from the testimony presented to us at the last session of Congress that the price fixed for senators was $2,500 and that the members of the assembly got $1,000, and subsequently $900 of the "jack pot," and that it was all called "Lorimer money."

Thomas Campbell, of Rock Island, a farmer and a member of the lower house of the last General Assembly of Illinois, testified that he had been approached by a Lorimer representative and offered a job if he would change his vote from Hopkins to LORIMER.

Q. When was that conversation?—A. Well, it was the next day. I met him on the street. He called me by name and I looked up to see who he was, and I did not think I knew him, but when he called me by name I hesitated, and he said, "I met you yesterday." And he introduced himself again. Do you want me to tell the conversation?

Q. Yes.—A. He said, "Mr. Campbell, I met you yesterday at the Peoria depot." I said, "Yes, I remember meeting you." He said, "I have been in the employ of Mr. LORIMER." I think he said seven years—seven or nine; am not positive, but I will say seven. He said, "He is a poor man's friend," and he said "I am looking after his welfare." And he wanted to know if I would not vote for him. I said, "I do not see how I can, as a Republican. I, as a Republican, must stand by the wishes of the Republicans of the State which gave Mr. Hopkins 47,000 more votes than the next highest man." Then he said, "Wouldn't you like to have a job?" My reply was, "You have not anything big enough for me." He said he was sorry and that was the extent of his conversation.

Mr. President, I am going to detain the Senate for just a moment longer with this testimony. I desire to come back again to that telephone conversation at the Grand Pacific Hotel. I became very much interested in it while examining this evidence, and I went through the record, bringing together all the testimony bearing upon that incident. I want to present it briefly to the Senate to see what impression it leaves upon your minds.

Did LORIMER have personal knowledge of the corruption? I think, Mr. President, it is shown by the testimony that he did.

That LORIMER was in daily and nightly conference with his Democratic lieutenant, Lee O'Neil Browne, scheming and plot-ting and planning to bring his election about, was fully disclosed by the evidence before this body at the last session.

New evidence secured by the Helm committee shows beyond question that LORIMER not only had personal knowledge of every step taken by the men who "put him across," but also had personal knowledge that money was used in his election.

How intimate were the relations between LORIMER and Hines during this time is shown by the testimony bearing upon a telephone conversation which Hines had with LORIMER over the long-distance telephone from W. H. Cook's room in the Grand Pacific Hotel on the day of LORIMER's election. Hines had just returned to Chicago from Washington. LORIMER was down in Springfield working with legislators to bring about his election.

Now, what I am about to quote is from Mr. Hines's own testimony. Parts of this testimony I have given you before. But I am now about to bring together the evidence upon this telephone conversation, to demonstrate that it was Hines at one end of the telephone wire and LORIMER at the other when there was talk about using money and sparing nothing in the way of money to put through LORIMER's election. I think it is rather important. I do not mean to say that the case depends upon this point by any means. There is a mass of testimony that shows, it seems to me, so overwhelmingly that LORIMER knew of this corruption that, even if it were not proven that there were bribed votes enough to take him out of the Senate, no unbiased and unprejudiced jury, putting together all the facts in this case, could possibly escape the conviction that this man had guilty knowledge of the fact that his way into this Chamber was corrupted.

Following is Hines's own testimony:

I telegraphed Congressman LORIMER that I was leaving Washington for Springfield or Chicago. I arrived in Chicago in the morning, on the morning that he was elected. I got off of the train and went over to the bank and telephoned him on the long-distance telephone, and told him that I was going down to Springfield to see him and to carry the message from the President, to impress upon those in Springfield that the administration wanted him to be elected United States Senator at the earliest moment possible.

That is what he tells this committee. I do not think that is what he telephoned to LORIMER from that bank. He had already given LORIMER all of the evidence that he could possibly have furnished him upon that point. He had previously wired him a message from Washington which could be shown to people in Springfield who could be influenced by the views of the administration and the views of administration Senators regarding the senatorial election. He had nothing which he could add to that. That is not what he said to LORIMER, but that is what he tells the committee he said to LORIMER:

He told me that I could save time and accomplish the same purpose if I would call up Gov. Deneen on the long-distance telephone and acquaint him with the message I had from the President. I called up Gov. Deneen on the telephone in the neighborhood of half an hour afterwards and explained to Gov. Deneen my message from Washington. I then telephoned Senator LORIMER about 11 o'clock that day and told him that I had talked with the governor and told him what the governor stated, and I think that is practically all of my connection with it.

Where was he at 11 o'clock? It will appear by what I will recite to you from the testimony that he was in the room of Cook, in the Grand Pacific Hotel; that he was on the telephone talking to LORIMER. In his conversation with LORIMER he made reference to the governor. With these men sitting by, engaged in conversation at that time, it was the easiest thing for them, hearing the word "governor," to conclude that he was talking with the governor.

Now, I ask Senators to bear in mind that the testimony of this man Hines himself is that about 11 o'clock on that day he talked again with LORIMER and told LORIMER that he had already talked with the governor.

I then telephoned Senator LORIMER about 11 o'clock that day—and told him that I had talked with the governor and told him what the governor stated, and I think that is practically all of my connection with it.

Mr. Hines made further reference to this telephone conversation in his testimony.

Q. And is it your recollection that all your communications with Springfield were from the Washington end of the line on the telephone?—A. No; I telephoned from Chicago before he was elected.

Q. Yes; one conversation you had with Senator LORIMER was from Chicago?—A. I had two conversations that morning; one with Gov. Deneen.

Q. Did you telephone from any other place or section of the country to Springfield?—A. No.

Now, Mr. President, we come to Wiehe's version, taken from the testimony:

Q. Well, will you tell the committee what the conversation—the telephone talk from Cook's room in the Grand Pacific Hotel—was?—A. Why, the conversation was substantially or practically as follows: "I have just talked with the governor on the long-distance telephone, and he assures me he will do what you ask. You know that the administration—you know what the administration wants. Now, leave no stone unturned to be elected. I will get down to Springfield, if necessary, in the morning." And when he got through talking he turned to the people in the room and he said: "I have just been talking to Senator LORIMER."

Who was in the room? Wiehe, Hines's brother-in-law, Cook, and O'Brien. Cook and O'Brien got the impression that Hines was talking with "the governor," although they fell into a dispute about it within an hour.

But Wiehe says that when Hines hung up the telephone he turned to them and said, "I have just been talking with LORIMER." Hines had told the committee that he talked with LORIMER at 11 o'clock—and it was about 11 o'clock that he is proven to have been over at the Grand Pacific Hotel. It was then he used the expression over the phone, talking with LORIMER, that he had been talking with the governor, which could easily have worked into the minds of those sitting by, not following his telephone talk closely, but casually, as men will hear such things, that he was talking either with the governor or the ex-governor.

Wiehe further testified that he knew of no other conversation that Hines had over the telephone with Gov. Deneen than the one at the Continental Bank just before he came over to the Grand Pacific Hotel.

Q. As far as you know, that is the only time he ever communicated with Gov. Deneen?—A. As far as I personally know.

We get now to W. H. Cook's version, taken from the testimony:

We were in the room for a short time, some, probably, three or four minutes. The phone rang. I went to the phone. The operator (I suppose) asked if Mr. Hines was there. I said, "Yes." She says, "Here is Springfield for him; here is the governor." I called Hines to the phone. * * *

Hines took the receiver out of my hand and he spoke in the phone. He asked, "Hello, hello, hello! Hello, is this you, Governor?" He said, "Well, I just left President Taft and Senator Aldrich last night in Washington. Now, they tell me that under no consideration shall Hopkins be returned to the Senate. Now, I will be down on the next train. Don't leave anything undone. I will be down on this next train, prepared to furnish all the money that is required. Now, don't stop at anything; don't leave anything undone; I will be down on the next train," or words to that effect—repeated it over three or four times.

This statement is corroborated by Mr. O'Brien, who agrees to all of it, except his impression is that Hines was talking to ex-Gov. Yates.

Following is William O'Brien's version, as reported to the committee by Special Agent Coan, taken from the testimony:

Q. Did you show Mr. O'Brien on that occasion a statement made by Mr. W. H. Cook, the witness who has just testified?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And was the statement of Mr. Cook's testimony which was shown Mr. O'Brien substantially what Cook has testified to here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did Mr. O'Brien say with reference to that statement?—A. The only thing he said was that while—the only difference there was in the statement was as to who was on the telephone. He said he was positive it was Yates—Gov. Yates—ex-Gov. Yates.

Q. That was the telephone conversation in the Grand Pacific Hotel?—A. Yes, sir. * * *

Q. Otherwise his version of those—well, his version of those conversations, as I understand it, was substantially the same as the testimony given by Mr. Cook, except that he said (O'Brien said) that the telephone conversation of Mr. Hines from the—over the long-distance wires at Springfield was with ex-Gov. Yates?—A. Yes, sir.

Now we find Hines attempting to cover his tracks. The following is from W. H. Cook's testimony concerning what Hines said to him about a year after this telephone conversation occurred.

Cook met Hines by appointment at McCordic's office in Chicago. McCordic is Cook's Chicago attorney. Cook testifies:

Mr. Hines came down there (McCordic's office) to see Mr. Davis and Mr. McCordic and myself about some exchange of some bonds that we were interested in. After our business was concluded, Mr. Hines and I went down together. As soon as we got out into the hall Hines spoke to me about a story that was going around to the effect or purporting to be something similar to the conversation which he carried on over the long-distance phone from my room in the hotel about a year previous. He says, "Now, this story comes from some telephone operator, some girl," he says, "and they have got it all mixed up." Says he, "the way they have got it is that I was talking from your office in Duluth with ex-Gov. Yates at Springfield, wherein I told him I would be down on the next train prepared to furnish a million dollars to elect LORIMER." "Now," he says, "you know that was not Yates at all I was talking with." He says, "It was Deneen." And then he went on to caution me about keeping very quiet about such a story, or about the conversation he held there. He said if it ever came out, that it would be betraying the confidence that President Taft and Senator Aldrich put in him, that he never could go back to Washington, he never could look either of those gentlemen in the face again, and that it would compromise some of the best people in the city of Chicago and the State of Minnesota.

Cook repeated this conversation soon after it occurred, to McCordic and to his Duluth attorneys, Mr. Washburn and Mr. Bailey.

Here, again, we see Hines attempting to pervert the remembrance of a man whose exact recollection of what had occurred might prove damaging to Hines. Just as he tried to befog Funk's recollection of what had taken place that day at the Union League Club, so now he tries to smear over what Cook remembers of that telephone conversation from the Grand Pacific Hotel. It is a year afterwards. The whole country is stirred by the confessions of legislators. Hines brings up the matter with Cook. He cautions Cook about keeping quiet. He attempts to refresh Cook's memory of this phone conversation in the way that Hines wants it to be remembered.

Hines said, "It was Deneen." What more natural than that he should try to cover the fact it was LORIMER who was on the telephone? At this time Hines was trying desperately to prevent being "dragged into" the Lorimer affair. If Hines had made no statement about furnishing money, why should he try to throw Cook off the track in this way, to make him think it was anybody other than LORIMER?

Now it is interesting, Mr. President and Senators, to compare the different versions of what Hines said over the telephone. Let us follow the sequence of ideas, as each witness repeated the conversation:

HINES. Told LORIMER I had talked with the governor. Told him what the governor stated.

WIEHE. Just talked with the governor. You know what the administration wants. Leave no stone unturned to be elected. I will get down to Springfield, if necessary. I have just been talking to LORIMER.

COOK and O'BRIEN. Hello, Governor. Just left Taft and Aldrich. Don't leave anything undone. I will be down on the next train. Don't stop at anything. Prepared to furnish all money required.

Hines was not questioned closely as to this particular long-distance conversation. His reference to it occurs in the proper sequence in his narrative of what he was doing on the day of LORIMER'S election. Hence he makes no attempt to repeat to the committee the language of his conversation.

Hines mentions 11 o'clock as the time this second talk over the phone with LORIMER occurred. That fixes the place as the Grand Pacific Hotel, since it is clear in the testimony that Hines reached the hotel somewhere between 9 and 11 o'clock. The only reference to this telephoning in Hines's testimony, therefore, tends to establish the fact that it was LORIMER at the other end of the wire.

Doubtless this fact was in Wiehe's mind when he was questioned concerning the conversation. He, too, says LORIMER was at the telephone. He makes it specific and even dramatic.

Now, compare Wiehe's version with Cook's version. Notice the sequence of ideas, occurring in both:

1. The word "governor."
2. Taft-Aldrich administration.
3. Get busy now.
4. I'll come if necessary.

Wiehe and Cook disagree as to how the word "governor" was used, but both agree it was uttered. Otherwise we find substantial accord in the testimony of these two, even to the order in which Hines put his statements.

Cook is not positive—and does not claim to be—on this point. He says it was his "impression" that Deneen was on the phone. He also testified that immediately after Hines had left his room that morning he and O'Brien had an argument as to whom Hines had just been talking with. They went to McCordic's office and talked it over.

Chairman HELM. The difference was between you at that time, right after the conversation, as to which party was at the other end of the wire when that conversation was going on?

A. Yes, sir; it started off right there; I never felt very positive on that point, but Mr. O'Brien always felt very positive.

It appears from this that Hines did not make it clear who was on the phone, but his use of the word "governor" at the beginning is such that it is not at all unnatural that Cook and O'Brien should have received different impressions.

Consideration must be given to the orders which, it is agreed, Hines gave over the telephone. Is it likely he would be ordering Deneen to get busy, leave nothing undone? His relations with LORIMER all through this period, his constant communications to LORIMER, all show that LORIMER himself, not Deneen, was directing the operations at Springfield. The statements occurring in Hines's telephone conversation can mean nothing else than that he was giving final admonitions, instructions, and tendering assistance to LORIMER just before the latter was "put across."

I want to say at this time, Mr. President, that I took it upon myself to write a letter to the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate some two weeks ago, asking him to preserve in his files, if not already destroyed, a number of telegrams—somewhere from 30 to 60—that LORIMER sent to various people whose names frequently occur throughout this whole record—Shurtleff, Lee O'Neil Browne, Hines, and others.

I take this occasion to remind the Senate that there has lately appeared in the public prints a story to the effect that a mass of telegraphic communication between LORIMER and these men whose names have become so offensive could not now be produced. The telegrams referred to were sent while LORIMER was still in the House of Representatives. I do not know how that is, but if a committee is created here to investigate this matter they should sweep the ground clean; they should gather every bit of testimony pertaining to the whole affair.

I hope, Mr. President, that such a committee, if it is ever created, will not be satisfied with its investigation even when its work is conclusive with respect to Mr. LORIMER. I hope and trust, sir, that it will pursue this inquiry to find the men who were backing all this infamy, as I believe it to be, no matter how high up they may be in the financial circles of this country. The time has come, sir, when no man is too big to answer to the people of this country for seeking to undermine the principles upon which representative government must rest if it is to endure for our children and our children's children.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire whether he is about through with his discussion on the testimony. If not, I should like to move an executive session.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like very much to conclude to-night if the patience of the Senate is not exhausted. I have substantially concluded my review of the testimony. Following that I wish to take up the appointment of a special committee by the Senate to make this investigation. I can not dispose of that in a few minutes. If it is the pleasure of the Senate, I could defer that until to-morrow. I would like just to conclude, which I can do in a very few minutes, on this point, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CULLOM. I supposed the Senator would like to discuss the question of the appointment of a committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I certainly desire to do that.

Mr. CULLOM. I will wait, if the Senator prefers to conclude his general speech to-night, and then I should like to move an executive session.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will conclude with respect to the testimony in a very few minutes—in perhaps 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. President, this is to be considered, too: If the evidence before us shows the existence of a corruption fund and its distribution, then we can not escape the conviction that LORIMER knew it. He knew up to the minute every other fact in connection with his election—the testimony shows that Hines was in constant telegraphic and telephonic and personal communication with LORIMER. Is it possible that in all these talks LORIMER was told of every plan except that of raising the "slop fund"?

As to the promise to furnish all the money needed, it is natural Wiehe should deny it was made. His admissions, however, on other points tend to establish the truthfulness of Cook.

No doubt McCordic, of Chicago, and Washburn and Bailey, of Duluth, to all of whom Cook repeated this telephone conversation almost immediately after it occurred, would, if they had been placed on the stand, have been valuable witnesses. But the investigation was not pursued to the end. These men were not called. Some of them lived in other States.

So one might go on through this mass of testimony. Enough is contained in the evidence to establish beyond all reasonable doubt that—to quote from the official findings of the Helm committee—

It also appears from the testimony before us that said Hines communicated by telephone with LORIMER a few hours before said election and informed him, among other things, to leave nothing undone to secure said election and that all the money necessary would be furnished. The truth of this conversation is corroborated in no small way by the admissions of C. F. Wiehe and Edward Hines.

This being true, WILLIAM LORIMER had personal knowledge of the corrupt use of money in securing his election to the United States Senate.

But, Mr. President, this investigation in the Illinois senate came to a sudden and disastrous end. The writ of habeas corpus was interposed to stop the work of that committee. Application for that writ was made to a Lorimer judge of the city of Chicago and county of Cook. I say, and no reputable man will ever contradict it, that he was a creature of LORIMER. I am going to read one editorial. It is a calm and dispassionate discussion of the finding of this judge. Senators doubtless know that there is no appeal from the finding of this Judge Petit, under the Illinois statutes. It was in his hands to close the doors of inquiry to this committee and he boldly did it. That was the end.

The Chicago Post of the 8th of May, 1911, printed the following editorial:

JUDGE PETIT'S DECISION AGAINST THE ILLINOIS SENATE.

No one can rise from a thoughtful examination of Judge Adelor J. Petit's decision in the Tilden case without a feeling of pity for the judge.

Some people maintain cynically that every judge is "in politics." We don't believe that. We can recall a few instances, to be sure, but they were guilty, for the most part, of bad taste rather than of bad law. We do not at this writing recall a single judge in the county of Cook who has had to fetch and carry, as Judge Petit has had to fetch and carry, without a scrap of law to aid him and in plain violation of the doctrine laid down for such cases by the highest authority in the land.

The thing would be pathetic if the civic element in the situation did not so seriously outweigh the personal.

Judge Petit's decision is a very long and somewhat painfully rambling statement. Its inconclusive periods and its other rhetorical curiosities may be pardoned, for Judge Petit is new to the circuit court and its practice of writing opinions. Out of the whole thing emerges with much shillelah whirling the blunt dogmatic statement that the committee of the Illinois State senate had no right to demand for examination certain books and papers of Mr. Edward J. Tilden in an effort to ascertain the truth of the charge that moneys had been raised and spent in bribing, among others, members of the State senate to vote for the present junior Senator from Illinois.

That statement was all that Mr. Tilden needed. It was all that the junior Senator from Illinois desired. It was enough to do, somewhat crudely, the business on hand. But we hope that the Bar Association of Chicago will look into that decision. Deliberately to state as law what is not law is an abuse of the judicial function. Men will always differ in the interpretation of the law; but we have no hesitation in saying that neither the board of directors nor the grievance committee of the bar association will have two opinions regarding Judge Petit's ruling.

There are many interesting things to be said regarding the growth of the practice of legislative investigations in this country. Judge Petit might have touched upon them, but he did not. Perhaps we shall ourselves some day in the course of this discussion. For the present it may be sufficient to say that the practice has grown steadily, and, with some interesting and thoroughly explicable reservations, has been steadily and cheerfully bulwarked by the courts. In the entire story of American legislative history—Federal, State, and local—there has been, as some one has said, no feature so promising as the growth of this practice, the practice of investigating, of getting the facts, what might be called the scientific attitude. Public opinion and the two correlative branches of our Government—the judicial and the executive—have encouraged the method and smoothed the way. Along with this the courts have confirmed the right of legislative bodies to examine all witnesses on matters pertaining to their own membership and—note the addition—their own integrity.

Practically all the cases on this point—except Judge Petit's—now fall in line behind the well-known case of Chapman, decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1896 and reported in One hundred and sixty-sixth United States Reports. Perhaps the facts are still in general recollection. Congress in 1894 was thrashing over the Wilson bill, and the Senate had become greatly perturbed over persistent reports that certain Senators were speculating in sugar, and sugar, of course, was one of the important items in the tariff. The Senate appointed a committee to investigate, and that committee subpœnaed a Wall Street broker named Chapman to show whether his books carried the names of any United States Senators during the spring of 1894. Chapman refused to show his books and was arrested under a statute which, like a sort of fifth wheel, undertook to facilitate congressional investigations by making it a criminal offense, a misdemeanor, for a witness to refuse to testify. The United States Supreme Court, in an opinion handed down by Chief Justice Fuller, held that a congressional committee had full power to compel the witness to testify and to produce all material books and papers. It did not need the statute, nor did the statute interfere with a prerogative so supreme that Congress could not divest itself of it. The opinion began as follows:

"Under the Constitution the Senate of the United States has the power to try impeachments; to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, to determine the rules of the proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member; and it necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection. According to the preamble and the resolution, the integrity and purity of the Members of the Senate had been questioned in a manner calculated to destroy public confidence in the body and in such respects as might subject Members to censure or expulsion. The Senate, by the action taken, signifying its judgment that it was called upon to vindicate itself from aspersion and to deal with such of its Members as might have been guilty of misbehavior and brought reproach upon it, obviously had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the inquiry it directed and power to compel the attendance of witnesses and to require them to answer any question pertinent thereto. And the pursuit of such inquiry by the questions propounded in this instance was not, in our judgment, in violation of the security against unreasonable searches and seizures protected by the fourth amendment."

The court then took up the Kilbourn case, which grew out of Uncle Sam's vain attempt to find out, by prying into Kilbourn's books, whether the bankrupt Jay Cooke had any resources hidden away in a partnership with Kilbourn:

"In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168), among other important rulings, it was held that there existed no general power in Congress or in either House to make inquiry into the private affairs of a citizen; that neither House could, on the allegation that an insolvent debtor of the United States was interested in a private business partnership, investigate the affairs of that partnership as a mere matter of private concern; and that consequently there was no authority in either House to compel a witness to testify on the subject.

"But the case at bar is wholly different. Specific charges publicly made against Senators had been brought to the attention of the Senate, and the Senate had determined that investigation was necessary. The subject matter as affecting the Senate was within the jurisdiction of the Senate. The questions were not intrusions into the affairs of the citizen; they did not seek to ascertain any facts as to the conduct, methods, extent, or details of the business of the firm in question, but only whether that firm, confessedly engaged in buying and selling stocks and the particular stock named, was employed by any Senator to buy or sell for him any of that stock whose market price might be affected by the Senate's action.

"We can not regard these questions as amounting to an unreasonable search into the private affairs of the witness simply because he may have been in some degree connected with the alleged transactions, and, as investigations of this sort are within the power of either of the two Houses, they can not be defeated on purely sentimental grounds."

Of course it will be instantly suggested that perhaps a committee of the United States Senate is more august and has greater powers than a committee of the Illinois Legislature. Well, the former body may or may not be more august, but certainly it has not wider powers. Both Houses of Congress are expressly limited to the specific duties and powers named in the Constitution, and all the rest of the sovereignty is lodged with the State legislatures. The latter can do anything not expressly prohibited by the State constitutions, and there is not a line in the Illinois constitution which, even by implication, shuts the State senate out from an investigation of the charge that some of its members had been bribed to vote for a certain United States Senator.

It was a gross impropriety for Judge Petit to consent to take the Tilden case in the first place, in the light of his well-known personal and political relationships. That act alone is enough to warrant the bar association in examining the operations of justice in this community. But his decision is not only bad taste; it is indefensible law, an abuse of the judicial position too flagrant to be allowed to pass.

And now, Mr. President, in conclusion upon this branch of the testimony, I want to submit a few paragraphs from the final report of the investigating committee submitted to the Illinois senate. It is in the nature of a summary:

Your committee further respectfully represents that in pursuance of the information so obtained it caused the issuance of a subpœna duces tecum directed to the said Edward Tilden, requiring him to be and appear before your committee at a certain time and place, and to bring with him and produce certain books, papers, and other documentary proof, which, in the opinion of the committee, might indicate the amount of such fund and the identity of the persons contributing thereto, together also with the names of the persons receiving the same. And that it also caused George M. Benedict and William C. Cummings to be subpœnaed and to produce certain bank accounts kept by said Edward Tilden at and during the time of the collection of said fund.

That said Tilden, Benedict, and Cummings, to whom said subpœnas were directed, refused to appear before your committee or to produce the documentary proof sought. Whereupon your committee reported such refusal to this honorable body, which subsequently ordered the arrest of such contumacious witnesses and required their appearance before the bar of the senate, to show cause why they should not appear and testify and produce the documentary proof required.

That thereafter your honorable body caused warrants to be issued against said witnesses and placed them in the hands of one of the assistant sergeant at arms of the senate for service; that said witnesses were subsequently arrested under said warrants, but immediately secured their release under writs of habeas corpus issued by Judge Petit, of the Circuit Court of Cook County, who, after a hearing, denied the right in your committee and this honorable body to require the attendance of said witnesses or the production of said proof, and thereupon discharged said witnesses from the custody of your officer.

Your committee further respectfully shows and represents that the action of Judge Petit in that respect necessarily blocked and prevented an investigation into and examination of the books and papers and bank accounts of said Edward Tilden.

That in and by said decision it was held that under said senate resolution No. 17 your committee had no power or authority to subpœna witnesses or take proof because of the fact that the scope of said inquiry in said resolution named included not only members of the senate, but of the house as well; and that in the passage of said resolution the senate sought to embark upon an inquiry over which it had no jurisdiction.

That the effect of such decision made further investigation impossible, since any witness, whose testimony was desired, could refuse to obey any subpœna issued by your committee and could apply for and secure a discharge before said judge whenever the enforcement of such attendance was sought.

Your committee is advised and believes that in the matter of requiring the attendance of said witnesses it was acting strictly within its legal rights, and that the action of said judge was an unwarranted and unlawful interference on the part of a member of the judiciary with a legislative branch of the government. That the inability of your committee to compel the attendance of said witnesses and the submission of said documentary proof has prevented, on the part of this committee, a full and complete investigation into the question of corruption and official misconduct on the part of members of this or the last general assembly. And your committee is therefore unable further to follow the line of proof pointed out in the testimony of Mr. Funk, so as to report to your honorable body the exact amount used in the corruption of members of the last general assembly in the matter of the election of a United States Senator, or the names and identity of the persons contributing or receiving the same. * * *

They say:

From the oral proof already submitted we further find that shortly after the 26th of May, 1909, Edward Hines, of the Edward Hines Lumber Co., stated in conversation that he had been instrumental in raising the sum of about $100,000, which had been used to bring about the election of said LORIMER, and that he was then seeking to reimburse those who had furnished said fund by securing from different persons contributions in the sum of about $10,000 each.

I am giving this to show that the committee, after considering this testimony, arrived at a definite conclusion with respect to important facts, in so far as their investigation was permitted to go.

That following the publication of the confession of said Charles A. White, in the spring of 1910, and while a grand jury empaneled in the county of Cook was investigating the truth or falsity of said confession, said Hines sent C. F. Wiehe, his brother-in-law and one of his business associates, at midnight several miles across the city to the Grand Pacific Hotel for the purpose of inducing two persons to leave the jurisdiction of said grand jury, so that they might not be called to testify.

That the persons whose absence he sought to induce were residents of Duluth, Minn., one of whom, W. H. Cook, has since appeared and testified before your committee; and from his testimony, together with other facts and circumstances corroborative thereof, your committee is led to conclude that if said witnesses had appeared before said grand jury they would have given testimony which for the first time would have publicly implicated said Hines in said legislative corruption.

That at the time when Wiehe was sent on his midnight mission by Hines the name of the latter had not been publicly connected with any wrongdoing in the matter of said senatorial election, and it was evidently the purpose of said Hines and Wiehe to prevent, in so far as they could, the disclosure of any participation by Hines in the matter then under investigation by the grand jury.

That Cook testifies that when Wiehe arrived at the Grand Pacific Hotel Wiehe informed him and William O'Brien, the other nonresident witness, that LORIMER had called Hines on the telephone that night, with the request that Hines reach Cook and O'Brien and urge upon them an immediate flight from the city, so that they might not be called as witnesses in the investigation then being had.

That it also appears from the testimony before us that said Hines communicated by telephone with LORIMER a few hours before said election and informed him, among other things, to leave nothing undone to secure said election and that all the money necessary would be furnished. The truth of this conversation is corroborated in no small way by the admissions of C. F. Wiehe and Edward Hines.

That from the testimony of said White and others, in connection with the proof before your committee tending to show the existence of a large corruption fund, and from other corroborating proof and circumstances, too numerous to set out in detail, it would appear that a large sum of money was raised and used for the specific purpose of corrupting and bribing members of the general assembly in order to induce the election of said LORIMER to said United States Senate. * * *

That in the necessarily brief compass of this report it is impossible to call specific attention to all of the testimony supporting the conclusions of your committee with regard to the corruption of members of the last general assembly in the matter of the election of a United States Senator.

Your committee has reached the conclusion that the election of WILLIAM LORIMER before the last general assembly would not have occurred had it not been for bribery and corruption.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish just to say that I think I can conclude what I have to say in from half an hour to an hour or three-quarters of an hour, possibly. I wish to go into the matter of the appointment of a select or a special committee by the Senate, and I say that I purpose to show, according to the precedents of the Senate, that it does not violate such precedents to appoint such a committee. But I do not desire to detain the Senate to present that to-night, if it is the wish of the Senate to adjourn at this time. It is late and the discussion might carry me beyond 6 o'clock.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 25, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Territories.

RULINGS OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the following, upon which the Senator from Arkansas has given notice that he will address the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The response of the Post Office Department to Senate resolution No. 10, to require the Post Office Department to furnish certain information to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I should have contented myself with the answer of the Postmaster General to the resolution had it occurred to me that he had answered the resolution of the Senate candidly, but I do not think he did so. For that reason, for a short time I ask leave to discuss the response of the department.

Mr. President, I desire to relieve this discussion at the very outset of any apparent personal feeling upon my part. I beg to assure the Senate that I do not know Mr. E. G. Lewis, publisher of the Woman's National Weekly; never have seen him in my life, to my personal knowledge; neither do I know the editor of the Harpoon, published in Denver, Colo.; neither have I the pleasure of the acquaintance of the Postmaster General, Mr. Hitchcock; and I therefore could not possibly have any personal feeling in this matter.

My attention has been called to it, however, by the good women of the country who reside in almost every State in the Union, and who are subscribers to the Woman's National Weekly, which, in my judgment, is the cleanest, most wholesome family newspaper that has ever come under my observation. It has less of the advertising feature of any paper of similar character, is devoted to domestic science, literature, art, religious discussions, clean, wholesome news services; all in a condensed, concise form, ready for the housewife and mother who is unable ordinarily to spare the time to read the voluminous daily papers of the times. This complaint became so general and universal that I began to investigate the situation as best I could, and I frankly state, Mr. President, that in my judgment Mr. E. G. Lewis, editor and publisher of this clean, wholesome little sheet, has been the worst abused, the worst maligned and maltreated man by the Post Office Department, also the Department of Justice and their subordinates, that I have ever known in my whole life; and I began to set about to find a reason for the persecutions that have followed him.

It may appear in my former remarks on this subject, demanding an answer to the Senate resolution which I had the honor to offer, that Mr. Hitchcock alone is responsible for these persecutions; but such is not the case, Mr. President. His predecessor, Mr. Cortelyou, began this work of spoliation against this man in 1907, and it has been constantly and vigilantly kept up by the present Postmaster General and the Department of Justice to this good day. Mr. Lewis must be a wonderful genius to have accomplished in the face of the outrageous treatment that has been inflicted upon him the wonderful results he has attained.

He conceived the idea of the little city of University City, which lies adjacent to St. Louis, where he might build up a wonderful plant devoted to the education and culture of the women of our land, for the betterment of their home conditions. Clubs and leagues composed of the best women of the country sprang up in every State in the Union as if by magic, and because of the tone of his paper, its worth and merit, its circulation immediately became voluminous, numbering something like 500,000.

Mr. Lewis established a magnificent plant for the mechanical work of his paper, probably the most complete individual plant in the country. The subscription price of his paper was small and it became necessary for him to devise some means by which his patrons might send their small remittances without having to pay the price of bank exchange, so he conceived the idea of a bank. Stock was sold to some of the best business men in the country; also to his patrons and to the public generally. His scheme of charging no exchange interfered with the business of the express companies, and in this fact the reason for his downfall may be found. The express companies of the Nation, seeing that this man's idea, if it finally should prevail, meant the wreck and ruin of their business of handling money for the public, because his profits became enormous. His plan of operation was simple and unique, and I charge here now that through the instrumentality of the express companies and their paid hirelings Mr. Cortelyou, former Postmaster General of the United States, issued a fraud order against Mr. Lewis and his bank and caused him to be indicted for the improper and illegal use of the mails, which indictment was returned in the city of St. Louis. Mr. Lewis immediately begged for a trial, which was finally granted him, after his bank had been ruined by the issuance of this fraud order illegally, and, in my judgment, maliciously issued by the Government of the United States, through the Postmaster General, Mr. Cortelyou. Spies were put upon his track, agents of the Government were sent pell-mell all over the country notifying his stockholders and depositors and the public generally that he was a scoundrel and a thief and that a fraud order had been issued against him by the Government. This, of course, wrecked and ruined his banking institution. That is the point the express companies wished to accomplish. Mr. Cortelyou well knew and so did the paid hirelings of the express companies that Lewis had committed no wrong, no crime, and upon the final trial, after the testimony was all in, the distinguished judge who tried the case peremptorily directed the jury to return a verdict from the box, stating that the Government had no case, and that Lewis should never have been interfered with. But this relief came too late. The will of the express companies had been accomplished—his financial downfall had been secured. That he had been thoroughly vindicated by the courts of the country from the criminal charge made against him by Mr. Cortelyou in this fraud order offered him but little relief, because it came too late to save the fortune which his energy and ability had builded.

Not satisfied with this outrageous treatment and his complete vindication, Mr. Hitchcock, the present Postmaster General, who arrogates to himself such superiority that even a Senator of the United States is not permitted to enter the holy of holies to consult this great apostle of postal regulations without first giving to a lackey at the door a written statement of his business, ordered three civil suits brought against Mr. Lewis for excess postal charges, by means of which he has tied up to-day in the hands of the officials of the Government $30,000 of Mr. Lewis's money. Mr. Lewis has begged for a trial of these suits and has begged the Department of Justice to give him one letter or syllable of law upon which they might hope to be sustained. They deny him this simple justice, keep his money, when they know full well that he has violated no postal law or postal regulation which the department, under the law, had a right to make.

Mr. President, shall this matter continue? Shall 300,000 patrons of this paper stand up and clamor for justice and fair dealing and their voice go unheeded? Why, sir, we have just witnessed the most remarkable revolution against tyranny and oppression that the world in recent years has beheld; a little handful of Mexicans, inspired by love of liberty and the determination to throw off the yoke of tyranny, having God and right upon their side, have accomplished in Mexico what our forefathers accomplished for the Colonies against the tyranny of the kings. And this demand of the people, represented by this Lewis Publishing Co., can not go unheeded, and Senators had as well understand that this matter can not be brushed aside by a wave of the hand or a cold smile of indifference. They must act, and they must act wisely and judiciously, in the settlement of this controversy. I say, Mr. President, that the Postmaster General in answering the resolution of the Senate adopted on the 10th day of April, calling on his department for this information, has not answered honestly, has not answered truthfully, has not answered candidly the reasons that impelled him to the course he has pursued; and, in detail, I shall take up and analyze each of the answers which he pretends to give and show their hideous fabrication and their total insincerity.

The Senate resolution of inquiry was passed April 10, 1911. It, and the Adams letter made a part of it, are as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be required and directed to furnish to the Senate copy of the rulings of his department and his reasons therefor in regard to the circulation of the Woman's National Weekly, also the Harpoon, of Denver, two newspapers published in the United States, inasmuch as serious charges are made against said rulings, as is shown by letter attached and made a part of this resolution; that said information be furnished to the Senate at the earliest possible convenience of the department.

BANK OF DENNING,
Ozark, Ark., March 31, 1911.

Hon. JEFF DAVIS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As one of your constituents in this neck of the woods, would like to ask that you give a few moments' serious thought to some of the recent rulings of the Postal Department, from which it has been made to appear that certain officials have made arbitrary rulings relative to certain newspapers, and without apparent cause have demanded that one paper strike from its subscription list the names of upward of 100,000 subscribers, for the reason that relatives or friends saw fit to make them a present of the paper for a year by paying in advance the regular subscription price of said publication.

It occurs to me that there is a rotten egg in the basket somewhere that the Postal Department should say that because a friend desires to give a year's subscription that the department can step in and say that they can not receive same because they did not apparently send in the money in their own name.

Having followed your record for election of Senators by popular vote, and believing that you are in a sincere desire to give the common people a square deal, I will note with considerable pleasure any action you may take with reference to a thorough airing of the Postal Department in its arbitrary rulings.

Yours, very sincerely, R. M. ADAMS.

I refer to the Woman's National Daily, now the Woman's National Weekly; also the Harpoon, of Denver.

The Postmaster General's response to this resolution and letter is dated May 10, 1911. The Postmaster General first makes the following broad, general response:

Relative to that portion of the resolution embodied in the letter to Senator DAVIS, which says that this department "has demanded that one paper strike from its subscription list the names of upward of 100,000 subscribers for the reason that relatives or friends saw fit to make them a present of the paper for a year by paying in advance the regular subscription price of said publication," and "that the department can step in and say that they can not receive same, because they did not apparently send in the money in their own name," I have to say that no such ruling has been made by any officer of this department, nor by any other person on its behalf, either in the case of the Woman's National Weekly, of St. Louis, Mo., or the Harpoon, of Denver, Colo., or of any other publication, as will appear from the facts and statements hereinafter set forth.

This is a broad denial of the charge in the Adams letter, which was made a part of the resolution of inquiry.

It may indeed be true that the rulings made in this case are not technically the same as charged by Adams, but it is true that in effect they are exactly what he charged.

The Postal Laws and Regulations make it the duty of the Third Assistant Postmaster General to decide all questions in relation to the classification of mail matter and the collection of the lawful postage rates thereon. In the Woman's National Weekly case that officer has, in effect, demanded, as Mr. Adams alleges, that the publisher strike from the subscription list the names of upward of 100,000 subscribers for the reason that—relatives or friends saw fit to make them a present of the paper for a year by paying in advance the regular subscription price.

Exactly what that officer did is told in the language of his own telegram of March 27 to the postmaster at St. Louis. It is as follows:

[Telegram.]

MARCH 27, 1911.

POSTMASTER, St. Louis, Mo.:

Application of publisher of the Woman's National Weekly, dated March 21, received to-day. Information in possession of the department, obtained through queries to claimed subscribers to the publication, indicates that at least 24 per cent thereof are not subscribers in fact. This is strongly corroborated by reports of nonacceptance of publication by alleged subscribers at many post offices throughout the country, as well as by the statement of the publishers in admitting that a large percentage are gift subscriptions, and also by excessive use of premiums.

You will inform publisher that upon removal of 24 per cent of the claimed list—103,920—required deposit will be waived, effective with date of application, pending further inquiry.

Should the publisher desire to mail copies of the publication to persons whose names are eliminated from claimed list, they may be accepted at the transient second-class postage rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof, prepaid by stamps affixed.

You will obtain the publishers' decision and report to this bureau immediately.

JAMES J. BRITT,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

This, Mr. President, is the telegram of the Postmaster General in reference to these people. I ask you in all fairness, does it not bear out the charge that he has peremptorily demanded that 103,920 subscribers to that paper be arbitrarily cut from the list?

Technically speaking, the Third Assistant did not demand that the publisher strike off 100,000 names. What he did was to inform the publisher that unless 24 per cent of the list of subscribers (103,920) was removed he would continue to tax the third-class rate, which amounted to 17 cents a pound, on the entire list of over 400,000.

If the 24 per cent were removed, the balance of the list would be accepted at the publisher's rate of 1 cent a pound. The company could do one of two things—refuse to comply and close up altogether, or it could comply and continue to do three quarters of its previous business—that is what it meant. The company was, of course, bound to accept the latter alternative.

Upon this 24 per cent (103,920 copies), if they be mailed, the third assistant still imposes 17 cents a pound. But now it is not done as the third-class rate, but as the "transient second-class postage rate of a cent for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof, prepaid by stamps affixed." There are 17 copies in a pound. Each copy must be prepaid with a 1-cent postage stamp. Seventeen cents a pound is 17 cents a pound by whatever name it is called, and it is prohibitive to any publisher.

The Third Assistant required the "removal of 24 per cent of the claimed list (103,920)" because they "are not subscribers in fact." He estimates the number of objectionable subscribers from reports of nonacceptance by postmasters as well as from the statement of the publisher "that a large percentage are gift subscriptions and also by the excessive use of premiums."

Mr. Adams says that 100,000 names were required to be stricken off "because they (the subscribers) did not apparently send in the money in their own name." The Postmaster General denies that his department has made such a ruling. What he has done is to put an embargo of 17 cents a pound upon copies sent on "gift subscriptions," that prohibits the publisher from sending them out. There is some difference between Adams and the Third Assistant as to form, but not as to the effect. The response of the Postmaster General is at least disingenuous.

It will be shown further along that the action of the department is not only arbitrary and without warrant of law, but in direct violation of law. Furthermore, it will be shown that the very condition on which the action of the Third Assistant is based is due to lawless and unwarranted conduct by the department itself in dealing with this publishing company.

It is the province, indeed the duty, of Congress to examine into and consider from time to time how its laws have been and are being administered. In this case there are several matters which should be considered—whether there is authority for the action taken, the methods employed; whether there has been an abuse of power, and the effect of the action. To those matters some attention is given.

The Woman's National Daily (now changed to weekly) has been published since 1906. It was then and has since and up to the time of this change been admitted to the mails as a newspaper and as matter of the second class and at publishers' rates. Sometime in March last the publishing company decided to change the period of issue from daily to weekly, and did so, notifying its patrons and subscribers through the columns of the paper.

The changing of periods of issue of publications is a frequent occurrence among publishers. All the law requires in that regard is that the period of issue be stated in the publication itself, and that it (the newspaper or periodical) shall be issued not less frequently than every three months. The following is the paragraph of the statute on that point:

First. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

The Woman's National Weekly complied with that requirement of the statute. It was a well-established newspaper. Its character had been determined in the beginning in the regular way; it had its mail classification. The change from daily to weekly did not alter its character; it was still a newspaper. The change did not make it heavier or lighter as mail matter to be carried. It was the same publisher; the same publication office; the same post office of mailing; the same list of subscribers. It was the same identical thing formerly carried in the mails every day, but now to be carried once a week.

The company notified its subscribers that all subscriptions would be extended in proportion; that is to say, those who subscribed for the daily and some period of their subscriptions had been fulfilled were to have the unexpired period fulfilled by the weekly, but extended in proportion as the amount paid and unearned would apply on the subscription rate of the weekly.

The 103,920 subscribers which Mr. Adams says were paid for by "relatives or friends" as a "present of the paper for a year by paying in advance the regular subscription price," and which the Third Assistant says must now be removed from the "claimed list," because they are not "subscribers in fact," before he will permit any copies at all to be mailed at publishers' rates, were for some time carried upon the list of this newspaper while it was a daily.

They did not come in a bulk lot. They came in from day to day or week to week or month to month, and at the time this embargo was placed upon them the company was obligated to send out those copies in fulfillment of its contracts for the varying degrees of time for which those subscriptions had yet to run. Thus, in the middle of the fulfillment of these 103,920 contracts, the company is forced by the action of the department to default upon them.

For a long time the general public, and especially publishers, have been complaining, as does Mr. Adams, of the arbitrary acts of the Post Office Department in relation to the mail service.

In one way or another, the department seems to have abandoned the law as a guide for the conduct of that service. It is and has been imposing upon the public, and especially upon publishers, by means of so-called regulations, rulings, and so forth, conditions which Congress never authorized and never intended. Publishers have felt and have complained bitterly that there was no longer any security in the mail service; no uniformity, no stability. The so-called regulations are constantly changing. A reading of the law affords a citizen no reliable information as to what his rights in the mails may be. A reading of the so-called regulations affords him no reliable information, for the regulations of to-day may not be the regulations of to-morrow, and it is of record and notorious that neither the law nor regulations are applied uniformly to all cases, as the statutes of Congress contemplate.

It is popularly supposed that when a citizen or a publisher feels aggrieved by reason of a ruling of the department in his case, that he has recourse to the courts to secure justice. That, in effect, is a fallacy, because when the department rules in an individual case which is brought to test all the powers of the Government are invoked to secure judicial approval. Even special counsel will be engaged. The court is permitted to see only the isolated case, and it is impressed with the necessity of supporting the Postmaster General in his arduous duty of administering the law from day to day. It is made to appear to the court that it is a mere proper exercise of discretion in a multitude of cases similarly handled. The complainant is unable to get the department's files to show that this ruling is special and not in consonance with the rulings in other similar cases, and so show the court that it is therefore a denial of justice. The law unless uniformly administered to all alike under similar circumstances is not the law. The court, left in ignorance of facts essential to a just judgment and loath to interfere, will in all probability sustain the Postmaster General. The publisher, to win the verdict, must show clearly that the ruling is wrong. This he might be able to do if he could produce the department's records, which are denied him. Hence, the chances are all against him. It is a one-sided struggle.

But if the court should rule in the publisher's favor, still he has not won. The department will then carry the case through the United States Supreme Court, exhaust his funds, and wear him out. For years the final decision will be kept uncertain.

There is now pending in the United States Supreme Court a case wherein the department ruled the publication was not second-class matter because not a "periodical," although issued regularly once a week, and although it had been accepted as a periodical of the second class for many years, and the publishing business had been built up on the good faith of that mail classification. The publisher felt aggrieved and applied to the court for relief. In the meantime he is required to give bond for the difference between second and third class rates. The case has been pending over three years, and is not likely to be settled for a year or two yet. What publishing business could exist under such circumstances?

But even after a test case has been decided the Postmaster General is not guided by the decision in other similar cases. He acts as he pleases.

So it has come about that the Postmaster General is the despot of the United States postal service. He does not choose to be governed by laws. He is daily extending the scope of his meddling and his powers, by means of alleged "interpretation," far beyond the lines of the service and into the private business and lives of our citizens. One lawless step in the direction of assumed power unchecked encourages for another. Presently the law is altogether forgotten and it is practically impossible to force him to obey it. At will he can tyrannize over citizens, practically free from the restraint of the courts and the laws of Congress.

It is justly charged to be no longer true that the Postmaster General interprets the laws of Congress and administers them according to their intent and purpose uniformly and impartially. Now he makes his own law to suit his own purposes. He is not deterred by the rulings of the Supreme Court that every act of his must be founded upon some law; neither is he deterred by the statute which requires that all his regulations be "consistent with law." He introduces, in the form of regulations, rulings, or orders, whatever novelties he pleases. He is practically without restraint. The citizens of the United States, and especially publishers, are at his mercy.

Coincident with the development of our now great spy system, it is coming to be understood that no institution or citizen who resists the Postmaster General and asserts his legal rights can escape in the course of time annihilation of his business or himself, for the system which has been perfected ramifies to every phase of private life and endeavor, and never forgives a criticism, an exposure, or a defeat. Like the mills of the gods, its machinery may grind slowly, but it gets there just the same.

The Lewis Publishing Co. believes that it is paying the penalty for severe criticism of the officials some years ago. Since that time the official hand has never been lifted from its business. It has been kept under constant surveillance, and the official grip is now slowly but steadily tightening upon its throat. On April 23, 1906, the postmaster at St. Louis wrote the department a strongly indicative letter. Among other things, he said—

Mark you, Senators, how did the postmaster at St. Louis get this letter? He writes to the Postmaster General, and in his letter quotes what President Lewis, of the Lewis Publishing Co., said about the department:

> Lewis (the president of the company) has vilified and maligned every officer in any way connected with the fraud order issued against him—

My God! he ought to have maligned them. Other men had gone in and built up banking institutions, notably, the late Tom Johnson, of Ohio, establishing a bank by mail. Lewis was the originator, but Lewis received no benefit. Why? Because the hand of the Department of Justice and the Post Office Department was laid heavily upon him.

> Lewis (the president of the company) has vilified and maligned every officer in any way connected with the fraud order issued against him from the heads of the department down, including the judge of the United States court, and has placed all of them in the category of thieves, conspirators, dishonest officials, dupes, or incompetents. In letters signed by Lewis and in articles published regularly in his publications since the fraud order was made effective (all of which are teeming with anarchistic statements and charges of official corruption) your name alone, as an official, has received favorable comment. The effect of this on thousands of his credulous readers is appalling, as is evidenced by the fact that not only I, as postmaster, but other officials of the department here in St. Louis have received many letters of vituperative condemnation for the course they have pursued

This is followed with the statement of alleged facts which are intended to make out a case against the right of the company's two magazines to the mails. The paragraph so made up closes as follows:

> In the face of these indisputable facts I can not understand why any of his (Lewis's) explanations or statements are accepted as truthful or why he should be given the sufferance of the second-class privileges another day.

This is followed by a violent appeal for revocation of Lewis's second-class privileges on his two magazines. Subsequently, without a word of notice, the two magazines were closed out of the mails, and one of the largest and most successful publishing businesses in this country was summarily closed down. Hundreds of persons were thrown out of employment. This was done in the very face of, or in direct violation of, the act of Congress which requires that the right of a publisher to the second-class mail privileges shall not be suspended or annulled without a hearing.

The company complains seriously of the administrative conduct. It charges that there has been a deliberate campaign of ruin carried on against it in part by lawless acts on the part of the officials; in part by cunning devices of construction to give the law a false meaning to enable them to act as they did; in part by the assessing against its mail matter extortionate and unlawful postage rates; in part by the secret seizure and confiscation of its outgoing mail matter after it had been deposited in the mails; in part by the fraudulent indictment of its officers for alleged crimes that were lawful privileges in order to discredit it with the public; in part by the harassment of spurious civil suits to destroy its public faith and credit; in part by the holding up of its letter mail; in part by unauthorized and unnecessary ceaseless alleged investigations at its offices and plant, employing in the operation thereof half a hundred or so Government agents for a great part of several years; in part by conducting a Nation-wide intimidating course of inquiries among its patrons; and in part by other unauthorized, unjustifiable, and lawless acts.

It charges, also, that the officials conspired together to work, by these various processes, the ruin of its business, and that the purpose has been accomplished. The one remnant left is the Woman's National Weekly.

The company claims to have been damaged by the lawless conduct of the officials to the extent of millions. It is seeking an opportunity to be heard in the Court of Claims on the merits of a bill to compensate its 18,000 stockholders for the wrongs it charges were inflicted upon them.

The company believes that the case of the Woman's National Weekly, now under consideration, is but an incident in the general official scheme. Regardless of whether it can make good on its allegations, what this case alone shows ought to be sufficient to warrant a searching investigation by Congress to ascertain the truth and to do justice to those concerned.

Before we get too far away from it, attention is directed back to the quotation from the St. Louis postmaster's letter. Note these words: "In letters signed by Lewis and in articles published regularly in his publications." In these letters and articles, says the postmaster to the department, there were "anarchistic statements" and "charges of official corruption." How, so far as the sealed letters were concerned, did the postmaster know that? One of the charges of the company is that in the operations of the department against its business its outgoing letter mail was held up, and for days at a time. It has proof of that. This postmaster's letter to the department at least indicates a suspicious knowledge of the contents of Lewis's signed letters. What were they held up for? That was a violation of law. If they were opened, that was another violation of law.

Incidently, at Fargo, N. Dak., two post-office inspectors have just been arrested for so tampering with the mail of one C. C. Van Dyke. No information is available as to what sort of a case there may be against these inspectors, but it is some indication of the operations of the system of which the Lewis Publishing Co. complains.

Now, to briefly examine into the case of the Woman's National Weekly, it has been published as a daily for some years. It has been carried in the mails at publishers' rate the same as other newspapers. Large capital is invested in the enterprise. A large and costly publishing and printing plant has been erected in University City, St. Louis, Mo. The newspaper is national in scope. It has subscribers in every State in the Union, altogether over 400,000.

The company employs an enormous field agency for securing subscriptions. This agency numbers some 70,000 persons. They secure subscriptions not only for this publication, but for some 100 others joined with the company in that department.

The company carries no subscription on its list which has not been paid for. It states, however, that probably as many as 100,000 out of the 400,000 are what would be called "gift" subscriptions.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that other papers have asked for these gift subscriptions, and that privilege is not denied them, namely, the Literary Digest. I have several copies on my desk. I have not now the time to read the notice, but on the front page in big letters their field agents are told that gift subscriptions are all right and can be sent through the mail as second-class mail matter and will not endanger the Literary Digest with the Post Office Department.

I have here the St. Louis Star of Sunday that carries with its Sunday edition a magazine which is published in the city of New York. It is not published by the St. Louis Star. These Sunday magazines are sent to 12 or 15 great daily papers and put in the paper, published not by the paper but by the company that publishes this Sunday magazine. Does the Postmaster General raise his voice against this publication sent out by these great daily papers? No. But he jumps on this Woman's National Weekly, the cleanest, purest sheet that I ever read in my life—started for the benefit of the mothers and the wives of the country. Shame on a Government official, Mr. President, that will raise his hand against the womanhood of our Nation!

The 70,000 field agents know something of the struggle of the company to preserve its life. The members thereof to help and encourage the company have seen fit to subscribe for others than themselves or have successfully solicited persons who paid for perhaps themselves and others. The gift subscriptions carried, therefore, approximate about one and a fourth to each field agent. None of these field agents paid for a bulk number.

Every person has had the experience of being solicited for subscriptions to newspapers, magazines, and books. Sometimes, when he has not cared to subscribe for himself, he has done so for others. It may have been in the form of a Christmas present to a son, a mother, a daughter, or a friend. Nothing in law or morals against that. There is probably not a publication in the country which does not carry upon its list some subscribers of that kind. But this company appears to be under the ban of the department. It is singled out and denied the right to do that which is common to all others.

The Third Assistant finds that the number carried in the case of the Woman's National Weekly is not 100,000, as stated by the publisher, but exactly 103,920 copies. He admits that it is a mere estimate. He arbitrarily orders the company to remove that number from its list, whether, as a matter of fact, it be more or less, or suffer suspension of business altogether by the imposition of the rate of 17 cents a pound upon its entire output.

On these 103,920 copies the Third Assistant suspends the rights of the company to publishers' rates for the reasons stated in his telegram of March 27. In some part those subscriptions had been fulfilled. The suspension of the publishers' rate upon them is without a hearing, as required by the act of 1901, the very purpose of which is to prevent the suspension or annulling of the privilege to mail at publishers' rates or of such striking down, in whole or in part, of an established enterprise without a hearing. That statute was designed, as its terms indicate, to give stability and uniformity to the service and security to publishers. That is denied this company by the device of an alleged postal regulation under the authority of which the Third Assistant assumed to act.

Briefly, the facts are that for some period, under the provisions of this postal regulation, an embargo of 17 cents a pound was suddenly and without warning imposed upon the entire 400,000 copies of this publication, and at the present time the company's right to mail at publishers' rates has been suspended and stands suspended upon approximately one-fourth of his entire output. These acts are charged to be discriminatory and lawless.

It appears that under the provisions of this postal regulation 443, which presently will be quoted, the company was required, when the change from daily to weekly occurred, to file a new "application" for the privilege to mail. This requirement was complied with March 21 last. The local postmaster demanded a deposit of money with him at the third-class rate. This was to continue on the mailings of all copies pending the decision of the department on the application. The third-class rate amounted to 17 cents a pound, and was, of course, prohibitive. The company had been mailing the publication for some years at a cent a pound. The department was asked to waive the deposit and accept the paper as before at the publishers' cent-a-pound rate. The regulation places the authority to decide on such a waiver in the jurisdiction of the Third Assistant. On March 22, the day following, the Third Assistant declined to waive the deposit of 17 cents a pound on the entire issue. His telegram and a number of others exchanged between the company and the department tell an interesting story. Here they are.

These telegrams may be pretty dry reading, Mr. President, but they are going to make somebody mighty hot down at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

POSTMASTER, St. Louis, Mo.:

Telegram received. Because of existing inquiry as to subscription list, I can not waive deposit of third-class postage in case of Woman's National Weekly pending reentry. When application is received I will give it immediate attention and decide at earliest possible date.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

Your wire received. The demand for third-class rate figures 1 cent per copy—17 cents per pound—there being 17 copies to the pound, and this is the demand being made and this is the amount required of us. No change in publication is being made excepting temporary change in period of issue; otherwise publication in all respects remains the same. Our subscription list of over 400,000 paid-in-advance subscribers makes demand for third-class postage prohibitive and amounts to suppression and confiscation of an established newspaper property valued at more than a million dollars complying with the second-class law, and this demand for third-class rate is unlawful. We have filed sworn statement with application for entry. Our lists are open to any investigation required, but it would occupy months, and I again request you to be good enough to accord customary waiver to third-class deposit.

MARCH 25, 1911.

Hon. FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

For years Woman's National Daily, regularly accepted at second-class rate, now asks to change temporarily its period of issue. Any inquiry does not change its classification, we having received no notice of such inquiry or hearing thereon. It is now being arbitrarily held up by demand for exorbitant and unlawful rate of 17 cents per pound. This has already resulted in loss of its yearly advertising contracts and damages to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars. With the largest paid-in-advance subscription of any newspaper in America, the unusual and oppressive measures taken have amounted to its ruin and suppression. We have appealed to you direct for fairness and justice, and are refused both. We ask nothing unusual. Failing in our appeal to you, we are left no other recourse but to appeal direct to the daily press of the country, asking them to notify our million readers and to hold both you and the St. Louis postmaster in damages of half a million dollars each.

POSTMASTER, St. Louis, Mo.:

Application of publisher of the Woman's National Weekly dated March 21 received to-day. Information in possession of the department obtained through queries to claimed subscribers to the publication indicates that at least 24 per cent thereof are not subscribers in fact. This is strongly corroborated by reports of nonacceptance of publication by alleged subscribers at many post offices throughout the country, as well as by the statement of the publisher in admitting that a large percentage are gift subscriptions and also by excessive use of premiums. You will inform publisher that upon removal of 24 per cent of the claimed list, 103,920, required deposit will be waived. Effective with date of application, pending further inquiry. Should the publisher desire to mail copies of the publication to persons whose names are eliminated from claimed list, they may be accepted at the transient second-class postage rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof, prepaid by stamps affixed. You will obtain the publishers' decision and report to this bureau immediately.

(Signed) JAMES J. BRITT,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

UNIVERSITY CITY,
St. Louis, Mo., March 28, 1911.

Hon. FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

Order received through St. Louis postmaster partly waiving third-class postage, and I thank you for your prompt action and courtesy. His judgment of you seems to have been right. Pardon any harsh reflections, but long years of unfair, unlawful hounding by department has spoiled our temper.

Permit me to call attention, however, to Mr. Britt's ruling, which will place department in such a ridiculous attitude as to seriously reflect on it. He rules that certain of our subscriptions appear to be illegitimate because of being gifts paid for by others, or obtained with premiums, both of which are legitimate means of securing subscriptions unless abused. He estimates this percentage at 24 per cent, and directs that we cut down our mailings at second-class rate by 103,000 subscriptions, but does not specify which particular subscribers are objected to, simply the quantity. We must therefore cut off 103,000 subscribers at random without knowing which ones are considered illegitimate and which are not.

Why not give us a full, square deal? Take off the embargo; then make any investigation of the lists necessary, rule on the various classes of subscriptions, making the ruling applicable to all publishers, and we will not only comply, but will aid the department in such reforms. As it is now, a great newspaper property has been all but destroyed under pretext that its list of subscribers was being inquired into without a hearing or notice; then part of its list is declared second and part third class without specifying which is which.

We are fair men here, and in spite of reports to contrary are trying to do right, and have been patient under great injury. We have filed a sworn application for entry and are amenable for any misstatements.

If our entire list was second-class matter yesterday, it is to-day, as no change has been made in it, only in period of issue. To cut off a hundred thousand people who have paid for their papers will simply raise more sheol. No other paper in the country is so particular in regard to gift subscriptions. We even require an acceptance from person presented. We don't want them and would be glad of a general ruling declaring them invalid, but don't want an exclusive ruling made for our particular benefit. Give us a clean-cut square deal and we will meet it more than halfway.

Kindly put this up to Hon. Britt gently but firmly, and ask him to try us first and hang us afterwards. We ask only to mail paper to those whose subscriptions have been paid for at full price in cash, and we have no others on our list. If ruling is then made that any particular class are illegitimate, ruling to also be applied to other publishers, we will cheerfully comply.

We are being swamped with telegrams and letters of inquiry from all parts of America, and before getting out next issue ask that you lift entirely this ridiculous and unlawful embargo; give us a square deal and let's all take a fresh start.

Hon. FRANK HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

Last week's issue Woman's National Weekly still unmailed; this week's on press. All advertising patronage killed and a damage of hundreds of thousands of dollars already caused us. Mr. Britt's ruling was accepted Monday, but St. Louis postmaster is waiting official order to accept paper for mailing. Unless we are given relief by you to-day we see no alternative but to make general assignment stating reason to public. This means loss of millions to 20,000 stockholders, for which you will be held responsible by all concerned.

WOMAN'S NATIONAL WEEKLY,
E. G. LEWIS, President.

[Telegram.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 29, 1911.

E. G. LEWIS,
Lewis Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.:

Your telegram received. Postmaster has been directed to receive at second-class postage rate copies of Woman's National Weekly to the number named in your application, less 103,920, which you agree to eliminate, and also to waive deposit pending further inquiry.

JAMES J. BRITT,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

It can not be Congress ever contemplated that a citizen or citizens engaged in a publishing enterprise should be any less secure under the laws of the land than those who betake themselves to other forms of business. More than any other the publishing business is dependent upon the use of the mails. Expressly to give security and protection to publishers Congress, in 1901, enacted the following statute, which forbids the suspension or annulment of a publisher's privileges without a hearing:

When any publication has been accorded second-class mail privileges, the same shall not be suspended or annulled until a hearing shall have been granted to the parties interested. (Act of Mar. 3, 1901.)

The action complained of in this case was under regulation 443, which practically defied the statute. This is the regulation:

In case of a change of name or of the regular periods of issue of a publication entered as second-class matter, or the removal of its known office of publication to another post office, the postmaster shall require the publisher to apply for reentry. In such cases the requirement of a deposit to cover postage at the third-class rate on mailings of the publication pending action on the application will, on application to the Third Assistant Postmaster General, be waived, if the conditions appear to warrant that action. (Regulation 443.)

There is something to be said on both sides of the question of whether the postage rates for second-class matter are too high or too low, but that is a matter for Congress and not the Postmaster General. In the National Railway Publishing Co. v. Payne case, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia made the following pertinent observation which applies to this case:

It is very clear that the Congress of the United States has not committed to the Postmaster General or to anyone else the matter of determining what should be carried in the mails as second-class matter and what as matter of the third class. It has reserved that power exclusively to itself. It has itself made the classification, and it is not competent for the Postmaster General to add anything to the statute or take anything from it. It may be that the classification has not been made with all the definiteness that is desirable. It may be, even, that the privilege of the mails has been grossly abused by the introduction into them of mail matter of the second class, which was never anticipated by Congress. * * * Yet it is not the province of the Postmaster General to remedy the evil, if evil there is, by a postal regulation, or by unwarranted interpretation of the law.

It has been already explained that the change from daily to weekly in this case did not alter the character of the paper. If it were a newspaper in the first place it was still a newspaper. The company alleges that it is the campaign of the officials, in some part already recited, which brought about the conditions which made it necessary to change the period of issue.

After two years of practically continuous investigation, so called, conducted at the offices and plant at University City and simultaneously throughout the country among its patrons and readers, the company's two magazines were summarily, without notice, closed out of the mails. One of the largest and most successful publishing institutions in the country was thus snuffed out of existence by a scratch of the Postmaster General's pen, and without a hearing, as provided by the statute quoted.

The same processes of extermination are going on with regard to the Woman's National Daily, now weekly. Referring back to the telegram of March 22, already quoted, it will be noted that Third Assistant Britt says there was an "existing inquiry." That was as to the daily. It is now on as to the weekly. The company believes that its newspaper is being investigated to death, as was its magazines. It was impossible to revive them after they were restored to the mails nine months after exclusion. It believes that everything possible is being done to harass and annoy it and its patrons and to cripple it by extorting its money as alleged postage and to prevent it from fulfilling its contracts with subscribers by applying prohibitive rates, while, as in the case of the magazines, its patrons all over the country are at the same time being subjected to a continuous course of irritating and exasperating official inquiries into their private dealings with the company.

It is in part because of these exasperating, intimidating, and threatening inquiries by the department that the company's patrons throughout the country refuse copies when they are sent as gifts, and often when they are paid for by themselves. It is that condition which makes it possible for Third Assistant Britt to say, as he did in his March 27 telegram, that there are "reports of nonacceptance of publication by alleged subscribers at many post offices throughout the country."

When this newspaper was first offered for mailing, in the fall of 1906, the business of the company was subjected to a rigid investigation by post-office inspectors. This was at the plant in University City. Since that there have been several other investigations at the plant. In the summer of 1907 some 30 representatives of the Post Office Department appeared at the plant and demanded that the company turn over to them all of the subscription cards, records, files, and other books of account. They informed the company during that investigation it would not be allowed to refer to any subscription card or to take from the files for use any subscription cards. When these Government representatives left off work at night, a watchman was placed in charge in order to keep any employees of the company from touching them.

This possession of the company's records covered a period of about 60 days. The company says that for that period it was forced at great expense to maintain a new and separate set of subscription lists. When subscriptions were received it could not always tell whether they were new or renewals of old ones, because it could not get at its records. Having received the money, it was obligated to send out the copies. It happened, of course, that two copies might be going to the same person, because it was not able to tell, its records being out of its possession, whether a subscription which came in was a new one or a renewal of an old one.

The company charges that during that time it was impossible to transact its business in an orderly and proper manner and keep it up to date. Ordinarily it requires a large number of clerks to keep up the changes constantly necessary to be made in such a large list. Changes of address are always going on, and there is other incidental work of cutting off expired subscriptions or continuing those which are renewed, and so forth.

During the 60-day period when these investigators had possession of the company's records 30,000 subscriptions expired. They could not be taken off the books, because the company did not know which ones they were. Copies, therefore, were sent out for them as usual. This was one other reason why postmasters could report the receipt of copies which were refused. The company was at the loss of both paper and postage.

The company charges that at the conclusion of this investigation its records were returned to it in the most topsy-turvy condition, and that it required its whole force of clerks three months to straighten them out so that its business could be conducted with the usual expedition. During this period it was next to impossible to correct or change addresses as notices came in or to cut off the paper after expiration of subscription, and so forth. That, of course, gave subscribers and patrons grounds for complaint. It also enabled postmasters to report to the department that they were receiving copies for delivery to persons who had not ordered or paid for them, or after expiration of the period paid for, or that copies were being sent to persons who had removed—all to the detriment and damage of the company.

The cause for complaint on the part of its patrons and on the part of postmasters to the department having been created in the ways described, let it now be considered that on the other side the department itself, or through its postmasters or through its post-office inspectors, was circularizing the patrons of the company, asking all sorts of questions concerning their business dealings with the company. The following is a copy of a circular letter sent out to the company's patrons April 20, 1907. Sweeping inquiry was made to ascertain whether the patrons were satisfied.

[Case No. 39640–C.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INSPECTOR, ST. LOUIS DIVISION,
St. Louis, Mo., April 20, 1907.

With the return of this letter please inform me whether your business transactions with the People's United States Bank; the Lewis Publishing Co., E. G. Lewis, president; F. V. Putnam, treasurer; and H. L. Kramer, trustee, have been satisfactory, and advise me fully as to the particulars thereof, and forward all your correspondence received from them, except the certificate of stock, which it is desired that you retain. You should also send the envelopes in which the correspondence was received, having first written your name on each for identification.

It is thought proper to make the above requests because of inquiries received at this office as to the business of the firm named, and this letter should not be regarded as in any way reflecting on their character or reliability, and should be treated as strictly confidential.

My God, Mr. President, what could be a reflection? Was there ever such a system of espionage inaugurated against the business of any institution on this earth as Mr. Hitchcock and his hellhounds have organized against this man? And still he said, "We do not wish this to be considered as a reflection upon their character."

Your early reply under cover of inclosed envelope, which does not require that a postage stamp be affixed, will be duly appreciated.

Very respectfully,

R. M. FULTON, Inspector in Charge.

These investigations and inquiries continued from time to time. In September, 1910, the Third Assistant circularized the patrons of the company from Washington, making inquiries of a somewhat similar nature. Now, the department is again active on the same lines, but the inquiries are being sent out in part by postmasters. Here is sample of the inquiries sent out by the postmaster at South Bend, Ind., April 28, 1911, to one C. L. Hudson, 548 Vistula Street, that place. The postmaster propounds these questions:

Are you a subscriber?
How did you become a subscriber?
Did you pay the full subscription price? If not, how much did you pay?
Is the paper sent you free? If so, by whom?
Was the subscription obtained through the American Woman's League? If so, upon what terms?

The company charges that to be a subscriber to any one of its publications since March, 1905, when the campaign against it began, has meant to be in receipt almost constantly of official inquiries of one kind or another. Sometimes they came from the department at Washington; sometimes from the postmaster at a certain place; sometimes from the letter carriers while delivering at the doors; sometimes from post-office inspectors. It has track of some 70 different communications and inquiries which have been so sent out. These inquiries and communications are couched in such terms as to irritate and annoy its patrons. Many are disgusted with the continuous surveillance, and refuse, even after paying for the paper, to receive it longer because of annoyance it causes them.

The effect of this circularizing campaign upon any business, but especially upon one which has to deal with its patrons at long range, like a publishing company, must be apparent.

The company alleges that it has in its files the written order (the documentary proof) for every subscription on its books and the evidence of the payment of the money, for how long a period and by whom paid, and that if such information be necessary in the administration of the postal laws in good faith, it can be furnished from the home office.

All these official communications to the patrons of the company, from whatever source, have had in them a seeming menace to the party addressed; some sort of trouble for him or for her for having patronized the company at all was and is to be inferred.

In the case of C. L. Hudson, of South Bend, Ind., just cited here as a sample, he did not reply to the postmaster's inquiry of April 28. On May 8 following the postmaster addressed him thus:

About two weeks ago I sent you a list of questions pertaining to the Woman's National Weekly paper that you receive from St. Louis, Mo., which you were to answer—

Listen to the presumptuous cur—

which you were to answer—

Was Mr. Hudson under any obligation to answer? By what authority do Hitchcock and his minions assume to make people answer?—

and return to this post office, but I have not yet received your reply. There will be three more days allowed you to send in your reply, and wish you would do so immediately before this matter will be referred to higher officials.

Three more days of grace, three more days of living before this autocrat, this high mogul of post-office efficiency, lets the hammer fall. Hudson then wrote the company as follows. He must have been from Arkansas, Mr. President, and must have moved out to Indiana. This sounds like an Arkansas man to me:

What answer, if any, do you want me to make? Please notify me at once. As yet I have ignored the questions, as I consider it none of the postmaster's damned business.

A fine answer. That ought to hold Hitchcock for awhile. It is not by reason of anything in the law, or, for that matter, in any postal regulation, that the Postmaster General or his assistant acting for him, or any postmaster or inspector acting for him, is required to make such inquiries into the private affairs of the patrons of this company or any other publisher. The records at the publication office showed everything in the way of evidence that possibly could be required in a proper administration of the law.

The company states that in its subscription list there were approximately 100,000 gift subscriptions. The Third Assistant estimates 103,920. Exactly what the number is could be told better from the records themselves than from the cumbersome, expensive, and business-wrecking methods employed. It may be doubted if Congress ever appropriated money to be spent for services of this kind—that is, the examination of these records.

Even if necessary in some degree, there is reasonable ground for questioning the good faith of the administration in the continuous investigations at the plant and inquiries throughout the country in this one case. A more insidious process of undermining a business could scarcely be devised.

Now, devoting attention to the law in the case, we find that under the act of 1885 it is provided that "all publications of the second class" when sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication shall be subject only to the cent-a-pound rate. The statute makes an exception of certain copies which may be mailed free of all postage. It also excepts the copies addressed for delivery by the carriers from the office of mailing. These must be paid by stamps affixed to each. All other postage paid by publishers is in money on the bulk weight.

The following is the act of Congress:

All publications of the second class, except as provided in section 25 of said act (of Mar. 3, 1879, ch. 180, 1 Supp., 249), when sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents, shall * * * be entitled to transmission through the mails at 1 cent a pound or a fraction thereof, such postage to be prepaid as now provided by law. (Act of Mar. 3, 1885.)

Now, under this March 27 telegram from the Third Assistant Postmaster General, 24 per cent of the copies sent out and not coming within the exceptions of this statute of 1885 are denied the cent-a-pound rate, although they are sent "by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication," which is all the law requires. This privilege, says the act of 1901 quoted, shall not be suspended or annulled without a hearing.

Now, to cap the climax, the Third Assistant holds that on 24 per cent of the copies sent "by the publisher thereof" the "transient" second-class rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction must be paid. This is the rate fixed in the act of 1884. In the unmistakable language of that act it may be applied only to publications of the second class "when sent by others than the publisher." The act speaks for itself. It is as follows:

The rate of postage on newspaper and periodical publications of the second class, when sent by others than the publisher or news agent, shall be 1 cent for each four ounces or fractional part thereof, and shall be fully prepaid by postage stamps affixed to said matter. (Act of June 9, 1884.)

The reason given for assessing this rate for "others than the publisher" upon 24 per cent of the copies sent by "the publisher thereof" is that there is estimated to be that number of "gift" subscriptions upon the publisher's list. They are held to be "not subscribers in fact."

The act of 1879, which creates the second class of mail matter and confines it to newspapers and periodicals, requires a "legitimate list of subscribers." That the Woman's National Weekly has that is not denied. Nor is it denied that it is "of the second class."

The act of 1885 fixes the cent-a-pound rate for publishers of publications "of the second class," with three exceptions, no one of which is involved in this case. Aside from the exceptions, all copies—"all publications" is the exact language of the act—are mailable at the cent-a-pound rate on the bulk weight "when sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication."

The statute makes its own exceptions to the cent-a-pound rate, and nowhere is there authority given to read other exceptions into it.

Neither that act nor any other act affecting this class of mail matter fixes any limit upon the publisher at the cent-a-pound rate, nor does it confine his privilege to subscribers' copies sent, or to sample copies, or to both. It includes all copies sent by him—the entire output. That is the language of the law. The company submits to the law and to all regulations consistent with law.

A practically similar case, and a revenue measure, was decided by the United States Supreme Court (Morrill v. Jones, 106 U. S., 466). Congress authorized the importation into the United States free of duty of "animals alive specially imported for breeding purposes." The Secretary of the Treasury issued instructions to customs collectors in the form of a regulation. It required that the collectors should be "satisfied that the animals were of superior stock and adapted to improve the breed in this country." Said the Supreme Court:

> The Secretary of the Treasury can not, by his regulation, alter or amend a revenue law. All he can do is to regulate the mode of proceeding to carry into effect what Congress has enacted. In the present case we are entirely satisfied that the regulation acted upon by the collector was in excess of the power of the Secretary. The statute clearly includes animals of all classes. The regulation seeks to confine its operation to "animals of superior stock." This is manifestly an attempt to put into the body of the statute a limitation which Congress did not think it necessary to prescribe. Congress was willing to admit, duty free, all animals specially imported for breeding purposes. The Secretary thought this privilege should be confined to such animals as were adapted to the improvement of breeds already in the United States. In our opinion, the object of the Secretary could only be accomplished by an amendment of the law. That is not the office of a Treasury regulation.

The Postmaster General has undertaken to do in the Woman's National Weekly case precisely what the Secretary of the Treasury undertook to do in the case of Morrill v. Jones—that is to say, he proposes to limit the scope of the cent-a-pound rate law so as to exclude, under his declaration that they are "not subscribers in fact," subscriptions paid for by others than those to whom the copies are sent as "gifts," and because they are so held to be not subscribers in fact to deny the publisher thereof the right to send them out at publishers' rates.

When a publisher receives the subscription price for his publication through the mails or otherwise he obligates himself to send out copies in fulfillment thereof to the address given. There is nothing in the law affecting this class of mail matter which requires a publisher to know or to inquire whose money it is that is paid for the subscription in order to place the name on his list as a subscriber in fact, or to entitle him to publishers' rates upon the outgoing copies in fulfillment of that subscription.

There is nothing in the law affecting this class of mail matter which requires a publisher to know or to inquire whether copies sent out by him in fulfillment of subscriptions received, whether paid for by the party addressed or otherwise, will be accepted at the point of delivery in order to entitle him to publishers' rates upon those copies.

Here is further evidence of the lawless character of the rulings. That refusals at post offices, which is in part the basis of the ruling of the Third Assistant, is something Congress anticipated is clear from the fact that it provided by statute (act of June 8, 1872) that postmasters should notify the publisher of any newspaper or periodical when any subscriber should refuse to take his copies from the mails. That act was amplified by another which imposes the same duty upon postmasters in the case of all copies sent out by publishers, whether to subscribers or not. The latter is the act of May 12, 1910, as follows:

> That hereafter when copies of any publication of the second class, mailed by a publisher at the pound rate or free in the county of publication, are undeliverable at the address thereon, the postmaster at the office of destination shall promptly notify the publisher of the fact, giving the reason therefor, and copies received five weeks after the mailing of the notice to the publisher, and in no instance until two successive issues thereof have been published, shall, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, be separately returned to the publisher thereof charged with postage at the third-class rate. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

If Congress had intended that refused copies should not be mailable at publishers' rates, fixed in the act of 1885, it would have so provided. If it intended that the rate fixed in the act of 1884 for "others than the publisher" should apply to refused copies, it would have so provided. It has provided that under certain circumstances refused copies shall be sent back to the publisher and that he shall pay on them the third-class rate.

If Congress had intended that copies sent out in fulfillment of gift subscriptions should not be mailable at publishers' rates, but should be subject to the rate for "others than the publisher," it would have so provided.

In the language of the court in the National Railway Publishing Co. case, it is not in the province of the Postmaster General to remedy what he may regard as an evil, if evil it really be, "by postal regulation or by unwarranted interpretation of the law."

In the language of the United States Supreme Court in the Morrill v. Jones case, the Postmaster General can not, "by his regulation, alter or amend a revenue law." He can not "put into the body of a statute a limitation which Congress did not think it necessary to prescribe."

It is undoubtedly an unwarranted interpretation of the law to deny the company the publishers' rate fixed in the act of 1885 on copies sent out by it from the office of publication for any of the reasons given. It is undoubtedly an unwarranted interpretation of the law to assess the "transient" rate upon any copies at all sent by the publishing company, and especially for the reasons given.

Under the law the postage rate upon matter "of the second class" depends upon who the sender of the matter happens to be. The act of 1885 fixes four different rates for matter "of the second class" when sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication or from a news agency. The act of 1884 fixes the fifth rate upon matter "of the second class" when sent by others than the publisher.

Manifestly, the rate for publishers on the one hand and the rate for "others than the publisher" on the other hand are not interchangeable by any sort of device of administration. The several rates fixed for the publisher are confined to a single point of mailing. The rates for "others than the publisher," namely, the general public, are not limited to any point of mailing. At that rate copies of the same publication may be mailed at any post office.

Conceding for the sake of argument that the Postmaster General had the power to say that the publisher should eliminate 24 per cent of his "claimed list," he could, as the law stands, by no possibility have power to assess the transient rate for "others than the publisher" upon any copies sent out by the publisher or any by news agency.

The Postmaster General twice denies that his act was arbitrary, as alleged by Mr. Adams. This is in spite of the Third Assistant's ruling of March 27, to the St. Louis postmaster, as follows:

> You will inform the publisher that upon removal of 24 per cent of the claimed list—103,920—required deposit will be waived.

If the company had not removed this 24 per cent, the embargo of the third-class rate of 17 cents a pound would have remained upon the entire subscription list of over 400,000. That would close up the business and was the effect of the order. If the company would remove the 24 per cent, the embargo would be lifted as to the remainder of the list. Says the Postmaster General:

> There has been no arbitrary elimination of any portion of the list, as has been claimed by the publisher, but simply a demand for payment of the only rate to which such copies of the publication were entitled as appeared from the facts before the department. There is not, nor has there ever been, the slightest intention on the part of the Post Office Department to deny to the Lewis Publishing Co. all right to the use of the mails to which it is under the law entitled.

If what the Third Assistant did was not an "arbitrary elimination of any portion of the list," what was it?

Nowhere in his response does the Postmaster General cite the "law" to which he refers; that is, the law giving him authority to make such rulings as were made, denying, on the one hand, the right to send out copies at publishers' rates and, on the other hand, assessing the so-called "transient" rate on 24 per cent of the "claimed list."

The Postmaster General's response is made up of numerous dicta, based not upon law but upon "regulations," themselves clearly arbitrary and unwarranted by law, and of dissertations upon alleged "duty to the public," when, in truth and reality, the duty to the public consisted in obeying the laws of Congress, which are couched in unmistakable language. The whole answer to the resolution is beside the point.

Adams charged that the rulings were arbitrary, which meant that they were without authority of law. The Postmaster General begs the question, and cities as the authority "regulations," so called, not the statute. Neither does he cite a statute upon which such regulations might be based.

The Postmaster General states that what has been done in this case is the "uniform rule of the department." He will have some difficulty in showing, if called upon, that such a course of treatment as that shown to have been administered in the case of the Woman's National Daily, now weekly, has been uniformly applied to the newspapers of the country.

Mr. President, I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, who I see has just stepped into the Chamber, that if they will inaugurate this investigation and make it searching and sweeping, search for that hidden pearl, the truth, and find it, if possible, I will furnish all of the testimony necessary to convict Mr. Hitchcock of willful, deliberate deception in this answer.

It may be doubted, even if such a course of administration were really authorized by law, and even if the whole force of the postal service were engaged upon it, whether it could be uniformly and properly performed. By assuming that it might be, the work would be very costly and burdensome to the people. It would cost much more than the postage revenue involved. At least the cost would be more than it now costs to maintain the entire establishment at Washington.

The following case is recited as an illustration of the "uniform rule in the department." Many others might be cited. The Sunday Magazine (see Exhibit A) is published by The Associated Sunday Magazine (Inc.) of New York, with a branch office in Chicago. The Sunday Magazine is a weekly publication. It claims a weekly circulation of 1,300,000 copies. This number of copies is divided up among 12 of the large newspapers in the country, no two in the same city. The Star, of Washington, D. C., is one of those newspapers. The copies sent to each newspaper are inserted in the folds of that paper as an alleged "Part 3." In that way a copy of this Sunday Magazine is gotten free into the hands of every subscriber and purchaser of one of the copies of the 12 newspapers with which it is sent out. It has about the same connection with these newspapers, or any one of them, as it has with the decalogue.

"Part 3" is the device by which the publisher of the Sunday Magazine circumvents the law which limits the mailing of each separate publication at publishers' rates to the "publisher thereof and from the office of publication." It is mailed at publishers' rates at 12 different post offices. The real "office of publication" is in New York, and the magazine so announces. If one desires to advertise in it, he must apply to the New York office or the Chicago branch office, not to any one of the newspapers with which it is sent out as an alleged "part."

"Part 3" is the device by which the publisher of the Sunday Magazine circumvents the law which requires "a legitimate list of subscribers." It is foisted free upon the subscribers to 12 different newspapers. It has no subscribers of its own.

"Part 3" is the device by which the publisher of the Sunday Magazine circumvents the "free circulation" prohibition of the statute, as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates. (Act of Mar. 3, 1879.)

Some years ago the Department of Justice advised the Post Office Department that this alleged "Part 3" was a separate and independent publication, and not a legitimate part of the newspapers with which it was folded. The Sunday Magazine circulates to this day without interference by the Post Office Department. Encouraged by its success, other similar publishing enterprises have been established. They circulate their publications in the same way, in the folds of still other newspapers.

Nothing is heard of the Postmaster General asking the recipients of copies of any of these publications, through postmasters or otherwise, whether they are subscribers; how they became such; whether they paid the full price; if not, how much; whether the paper is sent them free; and if so, by whom, and so forth. Or whether their business transactions with the publisher have been satisfactory. Nothing is heard of any postmaster threatening such recipients as fail to respond to inquiries with report of their failure to officials higher up for chastisement of some sort. Yet the law is for all the same.

I am not complaining of this Sunday Magazine. I rather approve it, and might say much in its favor. I am simply citing the case as an illustration of the operation of the "uniform rule in the department."

Turning now to the morals of the case, consider that the Third Assistant makes use of the reported refusals to receive copies by the addressees as a reason for taxing the publisher the "transient" rate for "others than the publisher" on 24 per cent of the "claimed list." Against this the company charges that the refusals are largely due, and possibly mainly due, to the conduct of the department in irritating and exasperating its patrons all over the country by ceaseless inquiries as to their private transactions with the company, and that this causes them to refuse the copies whether they be gifts or not. Again, the great proportion of gift subscriptions, another reason for assessing the rate for "others than the publisher" on 24 per cent of the "claimed list," is due to the circumstances that the friends of the company desired to help it financially, and by an enlarged circulation to resist the lawless persecution of the department.

It is important to be noted that on receipt of all notices of refusals from such postmasters as have obeyed the statutes, the company acted promptly as possible and ceased to send out the copies. At the same time it took pains to write every person whose copies had been so discontinued. To the extent of from 50 to 60 per cent those persons responded, saying the refusals were upon a misunderstanding or were not justified by any act of theirs, and they have requested that their names be restored to the list and the paper continued to be sent.

The Postmaster General names something less than 30 post offices from which "reports of nonacceptance of publication by alleged subscribers" have been received. Exhibit B, submitted as a part of this case, shows the conditions as to the sending of copies of the Woman's National Weekly to these post offices.

Exhibit B, which is an answer from the Lewis Publishing Co. to that portion of the answer of the Postmaster General, I desire to insert without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. DAVIS. The Postmaster General says that the "Postmaster at Oak Ridge, Ill., states that he has, without avail, three times requested the publishers to discontinue the sending of undeliverable copies to his office." The company reports that it has no subscribers at all at that place and sends no copies at all to such a post office.

We caught Mr. Hitchcock one time sure. The paper has absolutely no subscribers at Oak Ridge, Ill., and never sent a copy of the paper there. In fact, there is no such post office in that State. It also reports that there is no such post office in the State named, and that the official list of post offices issued by the Post Office Department shows no such post office in the State named.

In conclusion, the matter stands: The Third Assistant has, after irreparable damage done by an imposition of the third-class rate upon the entire issue of the paper for some period, lifted the embargo of 17 cents a pound and allowed the company to mail copies to all subscribers at the publishers' rate of 1 cent a pound, except 103,920. Upon these he imposes the "transient" rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces, or fraction, which in effect is the same as the third-class rate—17 cents a pound—notwithstanding the company is under contract to send out those copies as much as the others. It is, in the main, ignorant of what particular subscriptions the department rules against. It must, under the terms of the order, arbitrarily cut off 24 per cent, whether it includes more or less "gift" subscriptions than the estimate; that is to say, subscriptions paid for by persons other than to whom the copies are sent. These, according to the ruling, are not subscribers in fact, because of reports of nonacceptance, and so forth.

All this comes about, in the first place, by reason of regulation No. 443, which is not a law, but a ruling. It suspends the protection intended by the act of 1901, which in no uncertain terms forbids the suspension or annulment of publishers' rates, once accorded, until there shall have been a hearing given the publisher. The suspension having, however, been accomplished, the acts of 1884 and 1885, which establish the postage rates for publications "of the second class," are applied directly contrary; that is to say, to the opposite of their unmistakable language and intent.

The company by these means is denied the protection of the law and its lawful rights and privileges in the United States mails. It is prevented from fulfilling its lawful contracts. If it resorts to the courts to contest the ruling, the department will employ special counsel and resist to the end at an expense of much more than is involved in the question of postage. It will consume at least five years in getting the final decision of the Supreme Court. By that time the subscriptions in question would have expired, the company's business and credit would have suffered great additional damage, for its patrons would be dissatisfied and would, no doubt, so state if official inquiry were made of them to learn. The company would be wasting its energies to solicit them again for subscriptions.

And, finally, the company is in such a crippled condition from the effect of the long campaign against it, recited in some part herein, that it can not undertake the expense of a legal contest. It can not pit its now slender resources against those of the Government, which would be invoked against it. Besides, it desires to devote its energies and such financial resources as are at its command to the rebuilding of its wrecked business.

Perhaps Congress will deem it proper to ascertain, in the interest of justice, fair play, and uniform treatment of citizens under the law, as well as for the protection of publishers and institutions in general from like experiences, whether the laws of the country have been properly administered in this case.

I also desire, Mr. President, to submit the sworn statement of the attorney for the Lewis Publishing Co., Mr. Edward C. Madden, who was for eight years Third Assistant Postmaster General, showing only the correspondence between Mr. Cortelyou, the Attorney General, and Mr. Hitchcock and himself relative to this matter. I do not desire to detain the Senate by reading the document at this time and therefore ask that it be printed as part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the request of the Senator from Arkansas is granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

UNIVERSITY CITY,
St. Louis, May 20, 1911.

Senator JEFF DAVIS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request for information in detail in response to the Postmaster General's letter to the Senate resolution of April 10, 1911, relative to refusal notices sent to the Lewis Publishing Co. and the Woman's National Weekly, will state that it is the rule for the subscription department to give these notices immediate attention. Whether from a postmaster or subscriber, they are taken from our list as quickly as possible. However, some notices of refusal are received from postmasters throughout the country who fail to copy the full name on the refusal card correctly. This has been one of our greatest troubles. We can not act until one is received that is a true copy of the name on our subscription list to enable us to pick it out. All such received are at once taken from the list.

When a notice of refusal is received from the postmaster, the subscriber is notified and given the privilege of being reinstated on request. From 50 to 60 per cent of those so notified asked to be reinstated for the full time paid for.

All subscriptions received by us and known to be gifts are not entered until a notice is received in response to our request to know whether they will accept. When the sender fails to state whether it is a gift subscription, we have no means of knowing and can only take the subscription as having been paid for by the person whose name is given. We enter them as such on our list.

We make every effort to conform with the postal regulations, and are sending each day copies of our mailing lists to postmasters throughout the country, with the request that they check up errors in address, refusals, etc.; and, invariably, where we have large lists we separate them into carrier bundles, and our aim has been to cooperate with postmasters in every possible case, to lighten their work and make our subscription list the most accurate of any newspaper.

We have received many letters from the postmasters throughout the country thanking us for our efforts in this direction. We quote herewith a letter received from postmaster at Lawrence, Kans.:

LAWRENCE, KANS., February 11, 1911.

LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.,
University City, St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: I wish to call to your attention the first advantage of your routing your mailings according to our rural and city carrier routes. Your papers arrived in the office this morning at a time when the office was stuck with too much mail, and arrived also just when the rural carriers were ready to leave, but as your papers were routed in the bundle every carrier got his papers, making a Saturday reading, instead of a Monday delivery and no attention.

This office desires to thank you for the prompt attention and the very satisfactory manner in which the papers were prepared for distribution, and to again assure you that such cooperation will be well worth while from the efficiency standpoint of your paper.

Respectfully, IRVING HILL, Postmaster.

The Woman's National Daily, with the enormous circulation of over 400,000 copies being mailed each day, has the reputation of having the best equipped and efficient subscription and mailing system in the country. This has been conceded by publishers visiting our publication plant.

In the following paragraphs you will find statements covering each specific case of postmasters' reports regarding refusal notices, etc., as stated in the Postmaster General's letter to Congress in response to Senate resolution of April 10, 1911, relative to rulings in the case of the Woman's National Weekly:

1. Battle Creek, Mich.—Facts in this case are that 47 cancel requests have been received from the postmaster at Battle Creek during the past five months, which have received the usual prompt attention accorded to all other requests to cancel. We have 781 subscribers in this city.

2. Biddeford, Me.—Facts are that we have 163 subscribers at this city. All copies mailed to this office are on subscriptions paid for in advance, either by the subscribers themselves or by others for them. Records show that all notices of refusal from the postmaster of nondelivery for whatever cause have been given prompt attention upon receipt.

3. Wheeling, W. Va.—During the past six months we have received 30 requests from the postmaster to cancel certain subscriptions in Wheeling, W. Va., and each one of these requests received the usual prompt attention. We have some 300 subscribers in this city.

4. Oak Ridge, Ill.—We have no subscribers at Oak Ridge, Ill. There is no such post office, neither does the Postal Guide show any such post office. The Postmaster General errs in statement of refusal notices from Oak Ridge.

5. Hamilton, Mo.—During the past six months four notices have been received from postmaster at Hamilton, Mo., which have all received prompt attention. We have 47 subscribers at Hamilton, Mo.

6. Sioux City, Iowa.—Facts are that all notices received from postmaster at Sioux City, Iowa, have been given prompt attention and names were taken off the list early as practicable. The cancellation from our lists is invariably made from the first notice received and all other duplicate notices received are useless. We have at present 182 subscribers at Sioux City, Iowa.

7. Lawrence, Kans.—Requests to cancel from the postmaster at Lawrence, Kans., have always been met with the same promptness accorded all other requests, and taken off our list early as practicable. We have 482 subscribers in this city.

8. Sioux City, Iowa.—In the second report of the postmaster of Sioux City, Iowa, the facts are that his notices of refusal met with the same attention given all others, cancellations being made from the first one received.

9. Adrian, Minn.—Facts are that we have 13 subscribers in this city; our records show that they have been paid for. Notices of refusals were received from postmaster and canceled promptly.

10. Los Angeles, Cal.—Refusal notices have been received from postmaster at Los Angeles containing only the name of the subscriber. Inasmuch as our list contains some thirty subscribers by the name of Smith, we could not recognize cards received in this manner, and we returned a number of these requests to postmaster at Los Angeles, notifying him that unless all refusal notices sent to us contained the full name, initials, and street number, to enable us to cancel the proper and correct subscription, we could not comply. We then requested him to issue all notices filled out, as required by the postal regulations. The number of subscribers in Los Angeles at present is 7,230. The 132 copies refused by the Los Angeles postmaster were removed from our list. We are extremely careful to give each notice received prompt attention. In this case it takes four days before a notice reaches us after issued by the postmaster. This does not seem to be taken into consideration by the postmasters throughout the country, who mail, as a rule, a notice every five days until the paper stops coming.

11. Williamstown, New Brunswick, Canada.—January 5, 1910, we received four subscriptions, at $1 each, to the following persons: H. S. Grant, Whitfield Hunt, Byron Morse, and E. C. Shaffner, all of Williamstown, New Brunswick, Canada, from J. E. Shaffner, of Lawrencetown, Nova Scotia, Canada. These were received as gift subscriptions and canceled from our lists September 26, 1910, upon the notice received.

12. Holyoke, Mass.—Facts are that all notices of refusal received from Holyoke, Mass., were taken from our lists as soon as practicable. Records show in this case that all subscriptions have been paid for by subscribers themselves and others. We have 48 subscribers at Holyoke, Mass.

13. Elkhart, Ind.—Our subscription list of Elkhart, Ind., consists of 148 subscribers and our records show that each subscription has been paid for at the full subscription price by the subscribers themselves and friends who sent them the paper as a gift. All refusal notices received from the postmaster at Elkhart, Ind., have been taken off the list promptly upon receipt of same.

14. Medford Branch, Mass.—Facts in this case are that all requests were promptly taken from our lists, with two exceptions, due to clerks handling subscriptions erring and taking the wrong subscription from the list; this was corrected at a later date on receipt of additional request to discontinue. We have 98 subscribers at Medford Branch, Boston, Mass.

15. Oxford, Ohio.—The postmaster at Oxford, Ohio, has mailed us two requests to cancel subscriptions; these were taken off promptly on receipt of same. It is evident that notices claimed to have been sent to us have never reached us. We have 35 subscribers at Oxford, Ohio.

16. Pleasantville, N. Y.—The postmaster at Pleasantville, N. Y., has sent us four requests to cancel subscriptions; the first one was immediately taken from our list, but in the meantime three other notices were received making the same request. We have 11 subscribers at Pleasantville, N. Y.

17. Demopolis, Ala.—We have a list of 27 subscribers at Demopolis, Ala. These have been paid for by the following persons: Emma R. Labugun, Demopolis, Ala.; Mrs. Charles E. Pease, Dayton, Ohio; and John W. Smith, of Demopolis, Ala. Our records show that requests received from the postmaster of this town to discontinue publications were promptly taken off the list.

18. Palatka, Fla.—Refusal notice for the subscriber whom the postmaster has reported as dead for about three years, was taken off upon receipt of notice giving correct name of the subscriber. His previous notices had all been incorrect. We have 63 subscribers at this place.

19. Warrenton, Va.—All notices received from the postmaster at Warrenton, Va., were taken from the list upon receipt of the notice of refusal. We have 26 subscribers at Warrenton at present, and records show that they have all been subscribed for at the regular subscription rate.

20. Joliet, Ill.—Refusal requests received from the postmaster at Joliet, Ill., received prompt attention and were taken from our lists as soon as practicable. We received a letter from the postmaster at St. Louis, Mo., informing us to cancel a list of our subscribers, stating that the postmaster at Joliet had sent us several notices to discontinue this list. Investigation showed that the list mentioned had never been received by us; however, the list was canceled immediately upon receipt of same from the St. Louis postmaster.

21. Glencoe, Ill.—We have 16 subscribers at Glencoe, Ill., and the refusal notices received from this postmaster during the past six months have met with prompt attention.

22. Fort Wayne, Ind.—Records show that upon receipt of refusal requests from the postmaster at Fort Wayne, Ind., they were taken from our lists as soon as practicable.

23. Atlanta, Ga.—In Atlanta, Ga., members of the league have made gifts of our publication to some extent. If 146 of this list were not subscribers and did not wish to receive the paper, the postmaster failed to notify us of their refusal. During the past two years we have received some 60 refusal notices from the postmaster at Atlanta, Ga.

24. Asheville, N. C.; Lynchburg, Va.; Wilmington, N. C.; and Morristown, Tenn.—Our records show that 24 per cent of subscribers in these towns are gift subscriptions. No papers are mailed free, as stated by the Postmaster General. Records show they have been paid for, either by the subscribers themselves or others.

THE LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.
R. U. MYERS,
Circulating Manager.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, to determine whether or not the Postmaster General has answered truthfully as to the annoyance he said in his reply has been caused to the postmasters of the country about the undelivered copies of this paper, I had the Lewis Publishing Co. send me from their books an answer to this part of the reply of the Postmaster General, taking up each instance as mentioned by him in detail and showing clearly and conclusively that his statements in that behalf were untrue, and I desire to submit this report as a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Arkansas is granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXHIBIT B.

A CHAPTER FROM THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT'S SHAME—HOW OFFICIAL POWERS WERE ABUSED TO RUIN A LEGITIMATE ENTERPRISE DESCRIBED IN UNITED STATES SENATE AS "WAR"—INSIDE FACTS BROUGHT OUT.

[By Edwin C. Madden, former Third Assistant Postmaster General.]

[An affidavit.]

NOTICE.—A copy of this pamphlet is sent to each Member of Congress.

A congressional inquiry to learn with what fidelity and what propriety the country's laws have been administered and into complaints of administrative abuses is reported to be contemplated. The purpose is to furnish all Members in as concise form as possible reliable information in that connection.

The case presented deeply concerns the honor of the Government in dealing with its citizens. It is a grievance of a company composed of 18,000 persons, who believe they have rightful cause to complain of unjust oppression and harassment by Government officers using their powers for an ulterior purpose.

It is believed that the disclosures of this pamphlet clearly establish a case of infidelity to public trust and afford sufficient grounds for impeachment of two Cabinet officers for malfeasance.

The great Webster said: "The contest of the ages has been to rescue liberty from the grasp of executive power."

In Mexico a contest is on to rescue liberty from the grasp of executive power. Long continuance of one party in office fostered abuses. Complaints were unheeded. Then came armed rebellion. Now, after men have been shot down in sufficient number, comes the promise of reform of the petty tyrannies and the abuses of which the people long complained in vain. Assurances are given that reasonable complaints will hereafter receive attention, and that there shall be efficacious punishment of malfeasance, and that no official is to be reelected.

In this country good men have long been rebelling against and have come to have a grudge against every form of governmental power and authority. There has been so much abuse of executive power that all such authority is distrusted. As in Mexico, long continuance of one party in power is responsible.

A specific case is here stated. The evidence to support it is given. Eighteen thousand persons are directly concerned. Complaints have been in vain. Consider their grievance, put yourself in their place, and note how long they have patiently waited in the hope that their Government would yet deal honestly with them.

It is now a nation-wide understanding that the Lewis Publishing Co. has been subjected to severe lawless persecution by Government officers. This began in March, 1905, and continued hotly for two years. The Postmaster General, under whom the operations were conducted, then retired. Afterwards the attitude of the department, though still hostile, oppressive, and obstructive, abated some of its venom.

On March 2 last the case was brought up by Senator STONE in the United States Senate. A proposition was before that body to broaden the powers of the "spy system" of the Post Office Department. The Senator vigorously denounced the abuses of power by those spies under existing law. He cited the Lewis case as an example, and contended that their authority should be curtailed, not increased.

"There was," he said, "a citizen of my State, a publisher, a Mr. Lewis, whose case became a celebrated one. For some reason the department waged war against him."

A general congressional inquiry into abuses of official power seems imminent. Possibly it will include this extraordinary case. Maybe the light will be fully turned on.

A correct understanding of the Lewis case as a whole requires some study. This pamphlet brings out specially one feature of it, one chapter, which stands by itself and may easily be comprehended by anyone.

Before proceeding, a brief summary of what the whole case comprehends will be helpful. The company charges that there was among the officials of the Post Office Department and the Department of Justice a conspiracy to work the ruin and suppression of its business by the misuse or abuse of official power.

There was a motive for this, but that need not be discussed here. Regardless of what the motive may have been, the company is prepared to establish by competent evidence, when proper opportunity is given in the Court of Claims to be heard on the merits of its indemnity bill, the fact of the existence of the said conspiracy and to identify those concerned in it.

The company is also prepared to establish by competent evidence that through the systematic operations of the said conspiracy and its giving the official conduct the plausible appearance of duty, the company was lawlessly robbed of its money, lawlessly robbed of its property, lawlessly denied its rights in the mails, lawlessly denied the protection of the laws and the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen.

The company is also prepared to show that, to effect the objects and purposes of the said conspiracy, both alleged laws and alleged evidence were manufactured out of whole cloth and that judicial processes were basely prostituted.

The company is also prepared to show that, to effect the objects and purposes of the said conspiracy, its business was kept under a causeless, ceaseless, and credit-destroying official surveillance covering a period of over two years; that during that time there were from 25 to 50 Government employees stationed in its offices and plant, demanding and seizing its books and papers and examining into its private affairs; that during that time, under instructions from Washington, there was a nation-wide, systematic course of intimidating, credit-destroying inquiries conducted by postmasters and letter carriers when making delivery of the company's mail matter to the persons addressed regarding their business dealings with the company; that during the same time post-office inspectors conducted a campaign of credit-destroying inquiries by correspondence with the persons to whom the company's mail matter was addressed, ostensibly to learn if those persons were satisfied in their business transactions with the company; and that cause for complaint on the part of the company's patrons had been artificially created by the secret holding up in the mails of the company's mail matter—letters and magazines; and that none of such inquiries were authorized by law; and that all Government funds spent in the furtherance of these matters, probably a quarter or half a million dollars, was without warrant of law.

The spy system played an important part in the conspiracy. The whole case constitutes the "war" which Senator STONE mentioned. It inflicted upon the company damages to the extent of millions of dollars. The purpose of the "indemnity bill" is to make good in part the damages to the 18,000 stockholders of the company, and so redeem the Government's honor.

In passing, let it be remarked that, according to press reports, Attorney General Wickersham, speaking at Hotel Astor, February 18, 1911, to an assemblage in honor of Mr. Justice Hughes, lately appointed to the Supreme Bench, among other things said:

"Let us uncover and punish all corruption in office; let us remedy abuses of power; let us mold our laws to protect the oppressed and downtrodden; let us hold our representatives to strict accountability in the discharge of their duties."

The Attorney General is himself a "representative" of the people. One instance is here shown of where his official act failed to square with his public utterance.

Among other things, it is charged in this case that in the furtherance of the objects and purposes of the conspiracy the President and two other officers of the Lewis Publishing Co. were three times indicted fraudulently by the grand jury. The indictment numbers are 5222, 5257, and 5316. They were returned in the eastern division of the eastern judicial district of Missouri December 1, 1905, May 4, 1906, and July 6, 1907.

These indictments charge the officers named with the felonious conspiracy to defraud the Government of postage by depositing, or causing to be deposited, in the mails hundreds of thousands of copies of the company's two magazines on which the publishers' rate of 1 cent a pound only was paid, but upon which, according to the "form of the statute in such case made and provided," the rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction (4 cents on an even pound) should have been paid.

No notice was given the company that its right to mail at a cent a pound was limited, or that it was held by the authorities that the limit had been violated. The indictments came with as little warning as a bolt of lightning from a clear sky.

As a matter of truth, the "form of the statute in such case made and provided" fixed then as now the cent-a-pound rate without limit whatsoever for "all publications of the second class when sent by the publisher thereof."

But these indictments went further in misrepresentation of the "form of the statute." They alleged, not only that there was a limit in the statute, but that by its form copies in excess of the limit were subject to the rate of a cent for each 4 ounces or fraction, when, as a matter of truth, the statute fixed then as now that rate solely for "publications of the second class when sent by others than the publisher."

In other words, the indictments charged that the "form of the statute in such case made and provided" limited the company's right to mail copies of its two magazines at the publisher's rate of a cent a pound; that the limit was greatly exceeded, and that on the excess the higher nonpublishers' rate was by law required. The statute books do not now, and never did, contain such a "form of the statute." The indictments open with these words:

"The grand jurors of the United States, impaneled, sworn, and charged at the term of the court aforesaid, on their oath present," etc.

The operations of the grand jury, under solemn oath, were a mere pawn in the conspirators' game of ruin. An investigation will probably disclose that the jurors were deceived into this act of perjury by a United States officer representing the existence of such a "form of the statute."

But regardless of whether it were true that the "form of the statute" limited the company's mailings at a cent a pound, and that on an excess of the limit the higher rate was required, the company claimed that its mailings did not violate the limit. Subsequent to the indictments, the matter was investigated at a cost to the Government of between $50,000 and $100,000, and it was disclosed that the limit was not violated. A decision to that effect was made by the proper officer. The conspirators suppressed that decision, and substituted a false finding of fact to the contrary. Only the latter decision was permitted to be published.

This suppressed decision showed that the evidence upon which the indictments had been secured was false. If it had stood, the want of evidence alone would have compelled their dismissal. The company alleges that the purpose of these fraudulent indictments was twofold. The publication of them in Government documents sent out from time to time to the press to copy would have the effect of destroying the company's public faith and credit. The further purpose was, by means of the manipulation of the grand jury, the false law, and the false evidence, to railroad the officers of the company into the penitentiary.

Not one of these three indictments was brought to trial on its merits. The last of them was dismissed voluntarily by the Government in October, 1909. Their appearance from time to time and their being allowed to stand so long (about three years) had, however, accomplished irreparable damage to the company.

This case alone would seem to be proof that the Attorney General's proposition to "remedy abuses of power" is either but the idle vaporing of a man in charge of a great engine of destruction, which he controls only in name, or that he is not sincere, for there are still persons in the Government service who were responsible, in more or less degree, for this prostitution of the great Department of Justice.

Congress should not wait upon or trust the Attorney General to correct abuses of power. It should do it itself. Without delay laws should be enacted to protect citizens from such abuses as those described. Laws should be enacted to provide efficacious punishment for those who misuse their public offices. But above all, Congress should see to it that, without delay, there is a law placed upon the statute books which will make it possible for a citizen to effectually arrest the official hand which would, without just cause, despoil him of his good name or property, and to bring to justice him who does so.

The program of ruin comprehended harassment at every point. In part it was to rob the company of its money. By means of the same alleged "form of the statute" as was the basis of the indictments the St. Louis postmaster, acting under instructions from Washington, demanded from the company excess postage at the nonpublishers' rate upon hundreds of thousands of copies of the magazines mailed from time to time. The company appealed to the department. The question was kept pending nearly a year. In the meantime $29,550 in all was deposited under protest. A $50,000 bond was also given.

The company's appeal did not question the legality of the limitation upon its mailings. It disputed merely the accuracy of the count of the officials. The Third Assistant was the officer to decide. He gave the company a hearing, and subsequently instituted the investigation aforesaid. Later he decided from what was disclosed that no excess was mailed. It was then that the Postmaster General suppressed the Third Assistant's decision as to the fact of excess mailings and substituted his own to the contrary. This decision not only furnished the evidence to sustain the indictments, but confiscated the company's $29,550 deposited in trust. This false decision was issued on March 4, 1907.

The next move of the conspirators was to make use of the decision of the Postmaster General to institute three civil suits in the name of the United States to collect from the company $130,000 additional back postage at the nonpublishers' rate on alleged previous excess mailings not covered by the $29,550 aforesaid.

The most unenlightened person will understand that the bringing of such suits in the name of the Government and for such an enormous amount destroyed whatever vestige of public faith and commercial credit the two years' "war" had left the company.

But now the dismissal of the indictments in October, 1909, and the Postmaster General having now been out of public office for some period, it seemed possible that there might be a change of temper in the two departments. Not all, but a good number of those in the conspiracy were out of office. Now, too, there was a President reputed to be judicial, temperate, and fair. He would be likely to require, as far as was in his power, the undoing of any wrong which had been done in the name of the Government to any citizen. Indeed, it was thought he would regard the righting of such a wrong as this a paramount duty in order to redeem the Government's honor. Again, such a President would naturally surround himself with men more or less of that temperament.

Under these circumstances, and after sounding the Department of Justice, now under Mr. Wickersham, to learn whether the proposition would be considered, the company applied February 18, 1910, for a dismissal of the three civil suits which had been so long standing to its injury. The dismissal would open the way to apply to the then Postmaster General to return, as the law authorized, the $29,550 which had been wrongfully taken from the company, as explained. With that accomplished, the rehabilitation of the company might be possible. The following is the correspondence between the company and the Department of Justice, between the company and the Post Office Department, and between the company and the President. It tells its own story.

If the reader will follow out the one chapter of the Lewis case complete in this correspondence, it will throw much light upon the nature and character of the "war" mentioned by Senator STONE. It will show how the "system" works and how those now in office are able to, and do, protect from exposure the evil acts of their predecessors.

The first letter of the company to the Department of Justice was the formal application for dismissal of the three suits. In it were quoted all the statutes in relation to second-class mail matter and those fixing the postage rates on matter of that class. The letter showed clearly that the civil suits, like the indictments which had been dismissed, were not warranted by any law, and were without probable cause, and, like the indictments, spurious. The letter also showed that, regardless of whether there were such a "form of the statute," as alleged in the indictments and civil suits, an official investigation had proven that the alleged limit upon the company's mailings was not, as a matter of fact, exceeded, and that the decision to that effect, which was the basis of the civil suits, was false.

It is unnecessary to a correct understanding of this phase of the case to quote this long 24-page letter. It closes with the following, and was acknowledged by the Department of Justice under date of February 24, 1910. So the play begins:

"There can be but little doubt that you (Attorney General Wickersham) will have been convinced from a review of this paper that those suits are unworthy, and can not be maintained, and if pressed are predestined to fail, because not founded upon law or facts. Hence it is not conceivable that you would prolong the injustice to the publishing company of holding those suits over it, and so by indirection keeping it longer out of the use of its money. (The $29,550.)

* * * * * * *

"In conclusion we beg to express the belief that the honor and good faith of the Government demands the prompt granting of this prayer (the dismissal of the suits), and that it would be unrighteous to put the Government to the expense of prosecuting those suits and the publishing company to the expense of defending itself.

"The case is respectfully submitted, and an early response is hoped for."

The following is the formal acknowledgment of the company's letter of February 18, 1910:

WASHINGTON, February 24, 1910.

EDWIN C. MADDEN, Esq., St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 18th instant in regard to the Lewis Publishing Co., and to say that the matters referred to therein will be considered by the department as soon as practicable, and you will be advised later as to its views in the premises.

Respectfully,

J. A. FOWLER,
Acting Attorney General.

After waiting 30 days to be advised of the department's "views in the premises," the following letter was sent to the Attorney General:

ST. LOUIS, March 18, 1910.

Hon. GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM, Attorney General,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to state that on February 18 last I forwarded from here for consideration by your department an important question concerning postage rates and certain postage suits pending against the Lewis Publishing Co. My communication was acknowledged February 24.

In that connection, I beg now to say that there are very important reasons here for wishing to be informed as to whether any action has been taken, and to know, if it be convenient and possible to advise, by what date a decision on the question may be made.

Thanking you in advance for such information as may be proper to give me, I am,

Very respectfully,

EDWIN C. MADDEN,
For Lewis Publishing Co.

The foregoing letter was acknowledged by the following:

WASHINGTON, March 22, 1910.

EDWIN C. MADDEN, Esq., St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 18th instant in regard to the question as to postage rates and certain suits pending against the Lewis Publishing Co. in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Missouri, presented to the department by your letter of February 18, 1910, I beg to say that the matter is receiving careful attention and will be disposed of as soon as practicable.

Respectfully,

J. A. FOWLER,
Acting Attorney General.

After waiting another 30 days and smarting under the injustice, not only of the whole matter, but of the unwarranted delay, the following more vigorous letter was sent the Attorney General:

ST. LOUIS, April 21, 1910.

Hon. GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to say that under date of February 18 last I submitted to your department, on behalf of the Lewis Publishing Co., a statement concerning suits Nos. 5474, 5515, and 5516, now pending in the United States circuit court for this district. They were brought by the United States district attorney, the first in July, 1907, and the last two in November, the same year. Ostensibly they are to collect back postage at the "transient," or general public, rate on copies of the Woman's Magazine and Woman's Farm Journal, alleged to have been mailed in excess of the publishers' privilege at the rate of a cent a pound.

The object of that presentation was to show your department that those suits misrepresent the law, first as to the "form of the statute" alleged to fix limits upon the publishers' mailings at the cent-a-pound rate; and, second, as to the "form of the statute" alleged to assess against an excess of the limits "the transient second-class rate of postage, to wit, the rate of a cent for each 4 ounces or fractional part thereof."

It was sought also in that presentation to make it clear that even if the statutes were as represented in those suits, there were nevertheless, as a matter of truth, no such excesses mailed, and that from the nature of things it was impossible for the facts as to mailings to be as alleged.

On what was shown, concerning the law alone, it was expected you would promptly order the dismissal of those three suits, because if you looked into the matter at all, you must have seen they could not have been brought in good faith and on probable cause. They were simply to back up the Postmaster General in an unwarranted and unparalled course of administrative conduct. On the same alleged law and evidence criminal indictments against the president of the company and other officers had been returned charging conspiracy to defraud the Government of postage. The decision of the Third Assistant Postmaster General that no excess copies had been mailed under the limits applied left the indictments without any evidence. That decision was suppressed, and the Postmaster General himself decided to the contrary and furnished the "evidence." After being allowed to stand long enough to do inestimable damage to the company the indictments were dismissed in October, 1909, presumably because your department found there was no such "form of the statute" as they represented.

We believe that an investigation will show that neither the indictments for conspiracy nor the civil suits for back postage were drawn by the district attorney. We think they were drawn by the post-office inspectors—the Postmaster General's personal representatives. It is inconceivable that one learned in the law at all, as a district attorney must be, would have drawn criminal indictments and civil suits in the name of the United States which so grossly misrepresent the form of the statutes.

The effect of the dismissal sought ought to be the return to the publishing company of $29,550, unlawfully extorted under the ruling of the Postmaster General dated March 4, 1907, the basis of which was the same alleged forms of the statute as were represented in the indictments and in the civil suits, one fixing limits at the cent-a-pound rate and the other fixing the transient rate on excesses of the limits.

If my letter did not make the foregoing matters altogether clear, I am ready and shall be glad to go more fully into the matter.

In a word the fundamental question for your department and the one upon which all of the suits depend is whether or not existing law limits the number of sample copies of a publication "of the second class" which a publisher may send on his own account and from the office of publication at the publishers' rate of a cent a pound. If there be no limit, the suits can not stand. If there be a limit, there still remains the question of the legality of charging upon the alleged excesses of the limits a rate for "others than the publisher." That is the case.

All of the statutes having any possible bearing upon this question are furnished on the inclosed sheets. You are an experienced lawyer. It will not take you five minutes to review them and determine the law questions.

In this connection it may be of interest to know that Congress appointed a commission of three Senators and three Members of the House of Representatives, all but one lawyers, to consider the whole subject of second-class mail matter. That commission reported back to Congress in Document No. 608, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session. On page 40 of that report the commission in discussing the various provisions of the law, among other things, said that it gives an "unlimited sample privilege." The law, except in this one case had been so administered since its enactment in 1879. The courts have repeatedly held that the Postmaster General has no authority to enforce restrictions not in the statute. If a publication violates the law in any particular, the Postmaster General may, after a hearing as required by the statute, annul its second-class mail privilege altogether. In that event no copies at all could be sent as "of second class." There is no doubt of the Postmaster General's authority there.

One phase of the question worthy of consideration is that under the statute and practices of the Post Office Department second-class mail matter may not be forwarded by a postmaster until the lawful postage rate is fully prepaid thereon. The theory of this case is that only a cent a pound was paid for those alleged excess copies, whereas the law required they should be prepaid at the transient rate. The statute (R. S., 4051, sec. 373, Postal Laws and Regulations) makes the postmaster at the office of mailing responsible for any postage he fails to collect. Therefore if, as a matter of truth, there were a limit to the company's rights at a cent a pound, and that the transient rate may be required on copies mailed in excess of the limits, it was the duty of the local postmaster to collect the lawful rate at the time. He exceeded his authority in forwarding those copies without such prepayment. His failure to hold the mail and collect or to notify the publishing company that more postage was required places the responsibility for the deficient postage upon him. The publishing company complied fully with the law as it is in the books. The two publications were "of the second class." The copies were "sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication," and a cent a pound was paid upon them. If the company had been notified that those alleged excess copies were subject to the transient rate it might, as under the circumstances was its right, have chosen to withdraw them, because that rate is substantially prohibitive to publishers. The company could not be assumed to know, without notice at least, that a statute fixing the postage rate on mail matter "of the second class, when sent by others than the publisher," was to apply to it, a publisher.

It must be clear from what is said in this letter alone, if it be true, and its truth is easy to establish, that the integrity of the Department of Justice is seriously involved.

I should not have applied to you, sir, as I did February 18, and as I do now, but from my belief that the real function and high purpose of the Department of Justice is to inform grand juries and courts correctly as to the law—the forms of the statutes—and on the one hand on probable cause bring offenders and violators to trial and judgment, and on the other see that the unoffending are not molested, or without probable cause harassed by unwarranted indictments and dishonest suits which destroy commercial credit and which may otherwise injure a lawful and law-abiding enterprise, and but for my belief that any other course is to betray the law, pollute the fountain of justice, and be false to the oath to support and defend the Constitution and bear true faith and allegiance to the same.

After waiting 30 days for a decision on the matters submitted February 18 we wrote your department again seeking a decision. The Acting Attorney General replied to the effect that the matter was receiving careful attention and would be disposed of "as soon as practicable." Another 30 days have passed, and we are still waiting a decision.

We have endeavored to be respectful, temperate, and patient. No Member of Congress has been brought into the case, and no word upon the subject has been said in one of our newspapers or magazines. We think it is not being overinsistent to say that we feel we are entitled now to a decision upon the matters submitted February 18 last.

We have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully,

EDWIN C. MADDEN,
For the Lewis Publishing Co.

The foregoing letter stirred matters up a little. The writer does not believe, and the reader will scarcely believe, it intemperate under the circumstances. A public office is a public trust. This is a people's Government. The long course of tyranny and oppression to which the company had been subjected by the officials, now intensified by the exasperating delay in answering a simple question, justified every word in the letter. In Mexico the people are now in armed insurrection against the tyrannies and oppressions of Government officers no worse than those of which the Lewis Publishing Co. complains in its case. The following letter was the result:

WASHINGTON, April 27, 1910.

EDWIN C. MADDEN, Esq., St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, in further reference to certain suits by the United States pending in the United States circuit court at St. Louis against the Lewis Publishing Co. to recover alleged excess postage on the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal.

As you were advised about a month ago, this matter is receiving careful consideration and will be disposed of as soon as practicable. As it is not our practice, however, to dispose of such matters on ex parte statements, we have requested the Post Office Department to furnish us with its views in the premises. I may add that the decision of this matter will not be hastened by any intemperance of speech on your part, or covert threat.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM R. HARR,
Assistant Attorney General.

In order to remove or apologize for what might appear to be "intemperance of speech" or "covert threat," regardless of whether the language used was subject to that construction, the following letter was promptly forwarded:

ST. LOUIS, April 29, 1910.

Hon. WILLIAM R. HARR,
Assistant Attorney General, Department of Justice,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 27th instant. You say that the views of the Post Office Department have been asked concerning the suits pending against the Lewis Publishing Co. to recover alleged excess postage, etc., and that the matter will be disposed of as soon as practicable. You add that a decision will not be hastened by any intemperance of speech or covert threat.

This letter is to say that it was expected you might take the views of the Post Office Department, and probably those of the district attorney here, and it seemed to us there had been ample time to do so. But whatever those views may be, they can not change the law in the case.

I did not regard either my letter of February 18 or that of April 21 as intemperate or threatening. I offer my apology for what seems to you to be intemperance of speech or a covert threat, and so much of either letter as appears to you in that light I recall, and ask that the questions of law be decided upon their merits. We would like to have the matter disposed of peacefully and as promptly as possible.

Very respectfully,

EDWIN C. MADDEN,
For the Lewis Publishing Co.

The case with the Department of Justice now rested until July 16. Then the following letter was issued by that department. Attention is specially directed to the date, because of what will appear presently, and to the fact that no one of the letters from that department is signed by the Attorney General himself. It is always an "Acting Attorney General." That is one of the processes by which heads of departments avoid direct responsibility for official acts when the case is one in which they think it unwise to appear.

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1910.

Mr. EDWIN C. MADDEN,
St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: Referring further to your letter of February 18, 1910, on behalf of the Lewis Publishing Co., I beg to advise you that, after a careful consideration of the matter, the department thinks that the interests of the Government require that the three suits to recover excess postage on the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal, published by said company, should not be dismissed, but prosecuted to a prompt conclusion, and that the sum of $29,550 deposited by the Lewis Publishing Co. with the Post Office Department to cover excess mailings on said publications should be retained by that department.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM R. HARR,
Acting Attorney General.

The company has all along claimed that the bringing of the indictments, the bringing of the civil suits, and the taking of its money were acts unwarranted by any law. If, as a matter of truth, there were such a law, it could be no secret, and it surely was entitled to be informed. Hence, the following courteous letter of inquiry:

ST. LOUIS, July 18, 1910.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of July 16, 1910 (W. R. H., 60027–66), in which you advise me of your decision that the interests of the Government require the three suits to recover excess postage on the Woman's Magazine and Woman's Farm Journal should not be dismissed, as recommended, and that the sum of $29,550 deposited by the company, etc., should be retained by the Post Office Department.

The United States Supreme Court held in the American School of Magnetic Healing v. McAnnulty case that "the acts of all its officers (the Post Office Department) must be justifiable by some law." Will you be good enough to advise me as early as may be of the law or laws upon which your department relies to prosecute those suits, and of the law or laws upon which your action is based in advising that the sum of $29,550, deposited under protest by the Lewis Publishing Co. as alleged excess postage, should be retained by the Post Office Department?

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Respectfully,

EDWIN C. MADDEN,
For the Lewis Publishing Co.

There was no response to this polite and very proper request. The situation so far is that the officers of the company had been indicted and solemnly charged to have committed a criminal offense by violating a "form of the statute"; $29,550 of the company's money had been extorted as alleged "excess postage," under the same "form of the statute," and the company has been harassed and its credit destroyed by the bringing and long standing of civil suits to collect an additional $130,000 alleged excess postage under the same "form of the statute." Now, when this Department of Justice is cornered, and the issue is boiled down to the bare question of the identification of that statute, information is denied by the device of refusing to answer. So it is that the law under which a citizen's good name may be blackened forever, or under which the business of 18,000 citizens may be ruined, is not to be disclosed. It is small wonder that lately the public has come to regard "Department of Justice" a misnomer. But it had appeared plainly from the letter of April 27 from this department that it was "playing in" with the Post Office Department, and that it would be governed by its "views in the premises." It was then that the company abandoned hope of the "square deal," so called, from the Department of Justice and addressed the Postmaster General direct, May 16, 1910. This effort was simply to secure the return of extorted money. The following is the letter; it was written two months before the last-given letter from the Department of Justice:

ST. LOUIS, May 16, 1910.

Hon. FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: By reason of an order of the Postmaster General, dated March 4, 1907, the Lewis Publishing Co. was made to pay the sum of $29,550 postage at the transient second-class rate on a portion of the copies of its publications, the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal, which were mailed from the office of publication at the St. Louis post office in April, May, June, and July, 1906. The greater portion of the copies of the publications were accepted at the publisher's rate of a cent per pound. The transient rate (a cent per copy) was exacted on alleged mailings of copies in excess of the number lawful to be mailed by the publisher at a cent a pound.

The ruling of the Postmaster General was not the law, and it was contrary to the established practice of the Post Office Department. But, based upon his ruling, the Department of Justice brought several civil suits for back postage at the same transient rate on alleged previous mailings in excess of the postmaster's limits. The suits were all filed in 1907, and no one of them has yet been brought to trial.

On February 18 last we applied to the Department of Justice to dismiss the suits, because they were not founded on law or fact. That course was taken because it was thought inadvisable to appeal to you for return of this money while those suits were pending.

Several times the Department of Justice has advised that the matter would be decided "as soon as practicable," but about 90 days have now passed, and we have concluded not to wait longer. It is not at all essential to a settlement of the matter that there be any action by the Department of Justice before addressing you on the subject. It was simply thought to be a better course of procedure.

Inclosed with this you will find a copy of the case as presented to the Attorney General, under date of February 18 last. The exhibits, outside the appendix, are not furnished, because it is thought you would not be concerned in them.

The purpose of this letter is to ask you to be good enough to return to the Lewis Publishing Co., under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905 (sec. 486, Postal Laws and Regulations), the money ($29,550) which the local postmaster required the company to pay at the transient rate of a cent per copy on copies of the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal mailed from the office of publication during April, May, June, and July, 1906. Under the law the copies were mailable at the publishers' cent-a-pound rate, and the exaction of the transient rate was without warrant of law. The money was paid under protest, and was covered into the Treasury under an order of the Postmaster General, dated March 4, 1907, sustaining the ruling of the local postmaster.

The basis of the transaction was the allegation that the statutes fixing the postage rates on mailable matter of the second class limited the number of sample copies which a publisher might send from the office of publication at a cent a pound, and that any excess of that limit was subject to the transient rate. (Sec. 455, Postal Laws and Regulations.)

Of course you know that the statute does not limit the number of sample copies a publisher may send at a cent a pound, and that if it did so limit the number of copies, the rate for "others than the publisher," in section 455, could not lawfully be imposed upon an excess of the limit. But in this case there was, as a matter of fact, no excess.

You, no doubt, are perfectly familiar with the judicial decisions to the effect that an administrative officer may not impose conditions in addition to those in the statute. The decisions specially applicable to this question are that of Morrill v. Jones (106 U. S., 466); American School of Magnetic Healing v. McAnnulty; and National Railway Publishing Co. v. Payne (No. 1231, Apls. D. C.).

Even if the judicial decisions were not as they are, Circular 4 issued from the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General states in paragraph 8 of the syllabus, that "the statute does not put any express limitation upon the number of sample copies." The 1906 congressional commission considered the whole subject of second-class mail matter and reported to Congress in Document 608, Fifty-ninth Congress. It discussed the law of second-class mail matter very thoroughly, and among other things said it gave an "unlimited sample privilege." The law was so administered from its passage, except in this one instance.

The case was founded on the local postmaster's error of assuming the right to limit the mailings of the publishing company. His action was in excess of his lawful authority. In the controversy the company did not contest the postmasters right to limit, but disputed his claim as to the number of subscribers on the lists, which was the basis of his limitation. The investigation by the Third Assistant's office sustained the contention of the publisher that the limit was not exceeded. The Postmaster General overruled the decision of the Third Assistant without an appeal to him in due course. His action was dated March 4, 1907, and was an excess of his lawful authority, because it did sustain the postmaster in fixing a limit upon the number of copies which could be mailed at a cent a pound, and in assessing the transient rate on an alleged excess of the limit.

This is an application to you to do justice in the matter and to return to the company the money which was taken from it without lawful authority.

There are special reasons why we would be grateful for a prompt decision. The company will regard it as a special favor at your hand if you will arrange that your decision be mailed on or before May 25. We do not think it will take many minutes of your time to decide the questions at issue. It is wholly unnecessary to wait any decision of the Department of Justice.

Thanking you in advance, we are, very respectfully,

LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.,
By EDWIN C. MADDEN,
Attorney in Fact.

This letter, "by direction of the Postmaster General," was acknowledged by the following:

WASHINGTON, May 19, 1910.

The LEWIS PUBLISHING CO., St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: By direction of the Postmaster General, I have to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 16th instant, requesting a refund of $29,550 alleged to have been erroneously required on certain mailings of the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal, published by you, and to inform you that the matter will have due consideration and you will be further advised.

Respectfully,

A. M. TRAVERS,
Acting Third Assistant Postmaster General.

With the foregoing acknowledgment the case stood still until July 9. Nearly five months had passed and neither the Attorney General nor the Postmaster General had acted. The company, exasperated by the delay and the injury it was steadily inflicting upon its business, then wrote the President. The purpose was merely to force action by the departments. The following is the letter to the President:

ST. LOUIS, July 9, 1910.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
President of the United States,
Beverly, Mass.

DEAR SIR: I beg to lay the following matter before you and to state that I believe it of such importance as to call for your personal attention. It seriously affects large interests and many people. It is a complaint of the conduct of two departments of the Government toward those interests and those people.

To state the matter briefly, I, on February 18 last, asked the Department of Justice in a formal communication to dismiss three civil suits brought by it in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Judicial District of Missouri in November, 1907, to recover alleged back postage on certain copies of the Woman's Magazine and Woman's Farm Journal, published and mailed by the Lewis Publishing Co., of University City, St. Louis, Mo. The ground of the request was that those suits misrepresent the law and misrepresent the facts. This was conclusively shown in the communication. It was also stated that the continued pendency of those suits, as if sometime to be tried, was ruinous to the commercial credit of the publishing company.

It was also shown that there was no warrant of plausible right to put the Government to the expense of trying those suits, and that it would be unjustifiable to put the publishing company to the expense of defending such suits.

Being a question of law, it would not take the Attorney General five minutes to find that there is no such statute as those suits represent, and without such a statute the suits are spurious.

From time to time the department was requested to act. It has repeatedly responded that it would "as soon as practicable." In one communication it was stated that the views of the Post Office Department had been asked. There has now been ample time to get the views of the Post Office Department, but whatever those views may be they can not create a statute upon which to base these suits.

The second cause of complaint is that on May 16, 1910, the Postmaster General was appealed to to return, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905, the sum of $29,550, which had, in violation of law and on misrepresentation of facts, been extorted from the Lewis Publishing Co. by the Post Office Department as alleged postage on copies of the company's two publications, the Woman's Magazine and Woman's Farm Journal. The collection of this alleged postage was based upon the same misrepresented law and facts as the aforesaid civil suits.

Up to the moment of this writing neither of the departments has acted. It is now necessary to appeal to you for justice and fair play on the part of the Government. We have not come to you until compelled by the apparent indifference to the rights of citizens by the two departments named.

I myself, as Third Assistant Postmaster General, administered these postal laws for 8 years, and in all had 15 years' experience in their application. I may, therefore, be presumed to know whereof I speak. I assure you on my honor that there is no such statute in existence as these suits represent. I assure you that even if there were such a statute the facts upon which the suits are based are misrepresented, and that the records of the department will so show.

The case grows out of the circumstance that the postal laws governing the second class of mail matter were administered differently to this publishing company from what they were administered to other publishers. It was charged, wrongly, that the statute limited the number of copies which the publishing company might mail at a cent a pound, and that the limit had been exceeded in the mailings of both publications. Upon the alleged excess of the limit the "transient" rate for "others than the publisher" was fixed. The statute does not limit a publisher's mailings at a cent a pound. The fundamental error was that of reading the limit into the statute. That error having been committed, it was necessary to find a rate for the alleged excess. That for "others than the publisher" was applied. If Congress had intended to limit a publisher's mailings at a cent a pound, it would certainly have fixed a rate for an excess. There is none. The error in these suits is compound; first, that of fixing the limit; and, second, that of assessing the nonpublishers' rate on an excess.

But to make the case still worse for the Government, there was, as a matter of fact, no excess of the limit, even if there had been such a limit in the statute. An investigation by the department showed that the local postmaster's count was grossly erroneous. If the company had mailed thousands of copies more than it did, still the arbitrary limit would not have been exceeded.

It is upon this state of the law and facts that the suits, which we asked to have dismissed, stand.

It is upon this state of the law and facts that the $29,550 alleged postage on excess mailings, which we asked to have returned, was extorted from the company as a penalty for offending the then Postmaster General.

At this time practically all business is more or less depressed. These are strenuous days for the publishing industry. The keeping of these suits for alleged back postage pending, to the ruin of commercial credit, and the holding up of many thousands of dollars of this company's money, without a shadow of legal or moral right, are, therefore, specially aggravating. It is a matter of the importance of life and death.

The persons who compose the Lewis Publishing Co. and those who depend upon it for a livelihood are taxpayers and loyal, law-abiding citizens of the United States. Those citizens now appeal to their President, not for favors, but for justice and decent treatment at the hands of the Government they support. Their complaint is serious. It charges two departments not only with wrongdoing in the first place, but with now cruelly prolonging the aggravating, unjust, and unwarranted conditions.

If you care to have me do so, I shall be glad to go more fully into this case and develop it to completion for your information.

Will you, Mr. President, be good enough to direct the two departments named to act in these matters without further delay?

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.,
By EDWIN C. MADDEN,
Attorney in Fact.

The President was then at Beverly, Mass. The letter was acknowledged under date of July 12 by Secretary Norton. He stated that "by direction of the President the matters have been brought to the attention of the Attorney General and the Postmaster General, respectively." By reference to the correspondence with the Department of Justice, it will be seen that it acted on July 16 following. The letter is not signed by the Attorney General, but by an "Acting Attorney General."

The following letter is from the Postmaster General. It is dated July 5, but, as its acknowledgment shows, the envelope which contained it was postmarked July 12, seven days later. Plainly, the letter to the President set both departments in motion. But it took five months to get this far. The last of the indictments, after being allowed to stand about two years and a half and the doing of irreparable damage, was dismissed. At the time of placing this matter with the printer the civil suits, now four years old and based upon the same alleged law as the indictments, are still standing.

WASHINGTON, July 5, 1910.

EDWIN C. MADDEN, Esq.,
Care Lewis Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: Replying further to your communication of May 16, 1910, asking the return of $29,550 paid by the Lewis Publishing Co. during the months of April, May, June, and July, 1906, as postage at the rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof on copies of its two publications—the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal—mailed in excess of its legitimate subscription list and an equal number of sample copies, I have to say that upon the receipt of your letter I caused a full investigation to be made into the state of facts upon which this postage was collected, as a result of which I am advised that the same was justly and lawfully demandable upon grounds of which the company was at that time duly advised.

I must, therefore, for the reasons indicated, respectfully decline to refund to the company the sum of $29,550 as requested.

Very respectfully,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General.

The words "justly and lawfully demandable upon grounds of which the company was at the time duly advised," interpreted, mean that the company was "advised" of the law (the "grounds") upon which its money was taken as alleged postage. The use of the word "lawfully" signifies the existence of a law. Without that the money could not be "lawfully" taken. To make the record complete, and to show that it is not true that the company was "at the time duly advised" of the law under which its money was taken, the two orders of the Postmaster General, which state the "grounds," not the law, are here given. The manner in which the company was "advised" was to furnish it with copies of these letters:

WASHINTON, March 4, 1907.

The POSTMASTER, St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: In the case of the appeal of the publisher of the Woman's Magazine from your recommendation and action in the matter of demanding and collecting postage at the transient second-class rate on all copies of said publication mailed monthly in excess of its legitimate subscribers, which, as shown by the extended investigations of the department and the count of October 13, 1905, aggregated 539,901, and the excess of a like number properly marked and sent as sample copies, you are informed that upon the hearing granted the publisher on April 30 and May 1, 1906, and a careful and thorough investigation by the department, your recommendations are approved and your action sustained.

You will therefore remit to the department, in canceled stamps attached to sheets of paper, the excess postage that has been collected by you, and also make demand on the publisher for the balance due the Government, under the law and the regulations of the department, at the transient second-class rate of postage, upon all excess copies of the publication mailed on and after October 1, 1905.

In the matter of your recommendation that the department deny the pending application, submitted August 22, 1902, for entry of this publication as second-class matter, you are informed that upon a hearing granted the publisher on the same dates (Apr. 30 and May 1, 1906), and upon a careful and thorough investigation of all of the evidence by the department, I find that the publication does not have a legitimate list of subscribers, that it is designed and published primarily for advertising purposes, and that it is being circulated at a nominal rate, contrary to the law and the regulations of the department.

You will therefore refuse hereafter to accept for mailing, at the second-class rate of postage, copies of the said publication, and inform the publisher that his application for entry of the Woman's Magazine as second-class matter is denied.

Very respectfully,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Postmaster General.

WASHINGTON, March 4, 1907.

The POSTMASTER, St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: In the case of the appeal of the publisher of the Woman's Farm Journal from your recommendation and action in the matter of demanding and collecting postage at the transient second-class rate on all copies of said publication mailed monthly in excess of its legitimate subscribers, which, as shown by the extended investigations of the department and the count of October 13, 1905, aggregated 141,328, and in excess of a like number properly marked and sent as sample copies, you are informed that upon the hearing granted the publisher on April 30 and May 1, 1906, and a careful and thorough investigation by the department, your recommendations are approved and your action sustained.

You will therefore remit to the department in canceled stamps attached to sheets of paper the excess postage that has been collected by you, and also make demand on the publisher for the balance due the Government under the law and the regulations of the department at the transient second-class rate of postage upon all excess copies of the publication mailed on and after October 1, 1905.

In the matter of your recommendation that the department revoke the order granting second-class mailing privilege to this publication, you are informed that upon a hearing granted the publisher on the same date (Apr. 30 and May 1, 1906), and upon a careful and thorough investigation of all of the evidence by the department, I find that the publication does not have a legitimate list of subscribers; that it is designed and published primarily for advertising purposes; and that it is being circulated at a nominal rate, contrary to the law and the regulations of the department.

You will therefore refuse hereafter to accept for mailing, at the second-class rate of postage, copies of the said publication, and inform the publisher that the second-class mailing privilege heretofore extended the Woman's Farm Journal is withdrawn, and that the order granting the same is revoked.

Very respectfully,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Postmaster General.

Postal regulations which are consistent with law have the force of law. The regulations in effect at the time made it the duty of the Third Assistant to decide all questions as to postage rates, subject only to appeal to the Postmaster General. The Third Assistant did decide in this case in favor of the publisher. The Postmaster General endeavored to force the Third Assistant to reverse that decision. Failing, he used his authority to suppress the decision altogether, and without an appeal to him substituted his own, as shown in the two letters of March 4, 1907. The Postmaster General's decisions were unlawful, because so long as the regulation so provided he could have jurisdiction to decide only in the event of an appeal.

The foregoing two letters in the first two paragraphs of each state the "grounds" (not the law) for assessing the $29,550 as alleged "excess" postage upon a "hearing granted the publisher on April 30 and May 1, 1906, and a careful and thorough investigation by the department." This "hearing" and this "careful" investigation were not, as would appear, conducted by the Postmaster General, but by the Third Assistant Postmaster General.

The Department of Justice having remained silent upon the request of the company July 18, 1910, to be informed of the law which was the basis of the civil suits and the taking of the $29,550, a way seemed now to be open to press the Postmaster General for that information. In his letter of July 5, 1910, he stated that the money was "justly and lawfully demandable." Hence, the following letter:

ST. LOUIS, July 14, 1910.

Hon. FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt to-day of your letter dated July 5, but postmarked July 12, answering my communication of May 16, and declining to refund to the Lewis Publishing Co. the sum of $29,550 as requested.

You state in your letter "I am advised that the same was justly and lawfully demandable upon grounds of which the company was at that time duly advised."

Will you be good enough to inform me of the particular statute or statutes upon which the department relies in stating that the money was "justly and lawfully demandable"?

Thanking you in advance, I am, very respectfully,

LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.,
By EDWIN C. MADDEN,
Attorney in Fact.

The foregoing letter will surely be regarded as a courteous request for information, which should have received a frank answer, especially under the aggravating circumstances. Instead, it brought forth the following evasive reply. The Department of Justice made no response at all to the company's similar request in a letter of July 18.

WASHINGTON, July 29, 1910.

LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.,
St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of the 14th instant, in which you request that you be advised of the "particular statute or statutes" upon the authority of which the Postmaster General declined, under date of July 5, 1910, to refund to the Lewis Publishing Co. the sum of $29,550, excess postage collected on mailings of its two publications, the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal, during the months of April, May, and June, 1906.

In reply I have to say that the questions involved are now in the courts for determination and in the civil suits now pending between this department and the Lewis Publishing Co. in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri. The various contentions of the Government, including the subject of your immediate inquiry, are set forth in its several declarations of complaint, to which you are respectfully referred for further information.

Respectfully,

C. P. GRANDFIELD,
Acting Postmaster General.

It is, of course, true that the "questions involved" are "in the courts for determination." But the company believes they are not rightfully in the courts, and its request was to be informed, as it was entitled to know without equivocation, under what law or laws the suits had been brought and its money taken. The "declarations of complaint" in those suits do not, as alleged by the "Acting Postmaster General," show upon what law they are based. However, the company thought that the Postmaster General might now be induced to reconsider the matter. Hence the following letter, which recites the case in detail:

ST. LOUIS, August 13, 1910.

The honorable POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of July 29, in relation to cases C. D. 26575 and 58208, was duly received.

In your letter of July 5, to which you refer, it is stated that the $29,550 will not be returned as requested because it was "justly and lawfully demandable" upon copies of its (the company's) two publications, the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal, "mailed in excess of its legitimate subscription list and an equal number of sample copies."

As all postage rates are fixed by statute, or the right of your department to fix them is given by statute, I, in my letter of July 14, asked you to be good enough to inform me of the particular statute or statutes upon which your department relied in making the statement that the $29,550 in question was "justly and lawfully demandable," at the rate of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fraction, because under the act of March 3, 1885, it would appear beyond doubt that "all publications of the second class, * * * when sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication, including sample copies, * * * shall be entitled to transmission through the mails at 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof."

It has not been disputed that the copies upon which this money was demanded, at the transient rate of a cent for each 4 ounces, were copies of "publications of the second class," and that they (the publications) "were sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication." In the plain language of the law that is all that was required to entitle all copies mailed to the cent-a-pound rate.

Your letter of July 29 does not identify, as I asked you to be good enough to do, the law by the authority of which the transient rate was assessed. You simply advise that the "questions involved" are now in the courts for determination, "of the various contentions of the Government, including the subject of your (my) immediate inquiry." I believe, and have so stated to the Department of Justice, that suits 5474, 5515, and 5516, to which you refer, are spurious, in that they have no basis whatever in law and are not founded on probable cause. They have been standing for three years, and there is no prospect of a judicial determination of the "questions involved" in the near future. The information I asked for is urgently needed for immediate use.

Suit 5474 states substantially that by virtue of a "temporary permit" in the case of the Woman's Magazine and a "certificate of entry" in the case of the Woman's Farm Journal the company was definitely limited in mailing at the pound rate under the act of 1885 to copies sent as recited specifically in the "declaration." The declaration also states that copies in excess of those limits were subject to the "transient rate," which is the rate at which the $29,550 in question was taxed, and this suit purports to be to collect other postage at the transient rate on copies claimed to have been mailed in excess of the authorizations of the said temporary permit and certificate of entry; and the declaration further says "and said postmaster (postmaster at St. Louis) was then and there demanding and proposing to continue to demand upon such alleged excess copies the transient second-class rate of postage of 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fractional part thereof as provided by the act approved June 9, 1884, chapter 73."

Without quoting so at length from suits 5515 and 5516, they state only that they are based upon the "force of the statute in such case made and provided," but they do not identify the statute having such "force."

Said the court in the "Salvation" case: "The law must not only, however, be honestly executed by the department itself, but it must be honestly and faithfully obeyed by the person who is seeking to obtain the benefit of its privileges. He can not evade it by any sort of device. He must show the utmost good faith." The court's injunction as to "good faith" and the use of "any sort of device" to evade the law applies equally to the department.

Two important questions are involved in this case. The first is the statutory authority to fix any limits whatever upon the company's mailings of its two magazines while those publications were "of the second class," or to fix those limits said in the suits in question to be fixed by the "temporary permit" in one case, and by the "certificate of entry" in the other, those instruments being unknown to the law. The second question is that, as the act of 1884 mentioned in suit 5474 when read in its entirety applies only and unequivocally to copies "sent by others than the publisher," can that act be construed to the direct opposite of its specific language? In other words, how can an act which in its own specific terms excludes publishers be construed so as to apply to publishers, or to copies "sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication," under the unlimited privilege of the publisher under the act of 1885, unless there be still another statute somewhere authorizing, in the first place, the limiting of the publisher's unlimited privilege given in the act of 1885, and, in the second place, authorizing the imposition upon an excess of the limitation the rate fixed in the act of 1884 for "others than the publisher."

It is well settled that as to matters of fact the decision of your department is final. Also, that the department is absolute in the adoption of reasonable rules of limitation uniformly applied both as to what shall constitute a legitimate list of subscribers and sample copies for the purposes of admission of a publication to be "of the second class," or for the purposes of exclusion of a publication from that class, after a hearing. Especially to the point is the case of Conant v. The Postmaster General, equity 24361, in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the Lewis Publishing Co. v. Frank Wyman, No. 5417, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Eastern District of Missouri. The company does not now complain of the limitation upon its lists of subscribers or upon its sample copies for the purpose of determining whether its publications were due to be admitted to the second class or due to be rejected from that class. That is a different matter. Its complaint now is as to the application of unlawful rates to copies of its publications admittedly "of the second class" at the time of mailing.

The determining of what is and what is not of the second class under sections 10 and 14 of the act of 1879 is a question separate and apart from the question of rates, under the act of 1885, for matter which is "of the second class." In the two cases mentioned the power to limit what should enter into the composition of a legitimate list of subscribers and mailings of sample copies were the questions under consideration by the court. The limitations were approved as just and proper in the first case, and in the second held not subject to review. But no court has ever allowed, even by the remotest inference, that the "transient rate" for "others than the publisher" could be enforced on copies "sent by the publisher thereof (for himself) and from the office of publication" while the publication was "of the second class."

In the Conant v. The Postmaster General case it is shown (no such consideration was shown in this case) that the publisher was given "every opportunity" to correct his list of subscribers and mailings of samples to come within the very limitations in question in this case before the department acted on the rejection, but there was no attempt to assess against copies of the periodical (Salvation) while it was "of the second class" any rate but the publishers' rate in the statute of 1885.

It is, of course, assumed that your department is governed by law and as the law is interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. That court has held in a number of cases that the action of the head of your department or of a subordinate must be based upon some law, and that neither may impose, by ruling or regulation, conditions not in the statute; and that if the statute itself be wrong it is a matter for Congress and not the department.

The act of fixing the publishers' rate of a cent a pound to be paid in money is later than that fixing the rate for others than the publisher at a cent for each 4 ounces or fraction to be paid by stamps attached to the matter itself. The act of 1884 must be assumed to have been before Congress at the time the act of 1885 was under consideration. Both acts make the question of rate depend merely upon who is the sender of matter "of the second class." The cent a pound rate is limited to the publisher who sends from the single point of "the office of publication." The cent for 4 ounces rate is opened to all from any point of mailing.

The statute upon which the action taxing the $29,550 at the rate in the act of 1884 in the first place, and which you now approve by refusing to return it, because in the first place it was "justly and lawfully demandable" is the law I am in search of for the benefit of the 18,000 persons in this company which I represent. Your letter of July 29 does not give me the information I sought. It is, therefore, necessary for me to again ask you to be good enough to inform me definitely of this specific statute or statutes upon which your department relies in fixing the limits upon the company's mailings, under the unlimited privilege given the company by the act of 1885, while the publications were "of the second class," and I again ask you to inform me of the statute or statutes upon which your department relies in stating that the $29,550 collected at the "transient rate" fixed in the act of 1884 specifically for "others than the publisher," was "justly and lawfully demandable" upon copies of "publications of the second class, sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication" under the unlimited privilege at the cent a pound rate given the company by the act of 1885, while the publications were "of the second class."

My inquiry is on behalf of approximately 18,000 persons who compose the Lewis Publishing Co.—an honorable enterprise. They are citizens of the United States. They support the Government and are concerned in good administration. They want, if possible, to keep their faith in the honesty and fair dealing of the Government with the people. They do not seek and would not knowingly take any advantage of the Government. Likewise, they will not, without every possible resistance, permit the Government to take advantage of them to their loss or damage; or to put them in the position of being violators of the law. In this case they believe they have been wronged by the Government whose duty it was to protect them. They believe their money was literally stolen from them by distortion of the statutes and the facts; and that the suits mentioned are merely the stalking-horse in the unholy business, and are unworthy of serious consideration by any person, much less a lawyer, who can read the English language in which the statutes fixing postage rates are written.

Unless there be some other statute than those quoted herein, the convictions of the company would seem to be well grounded. They plainly contradict that the money was "justly and lawfully demandable."

The following is a restatement of the case to make clear the matters already stated, and to make plain the points of distinction and the laws which are essential to the proper understanding of those matters. Will you be good enough to reconsider the case personally in the light thereof? This request is made because in your letter of July 5 you say, "I am advised that the same was justly and lawfully demandable." That indicates that the decision was not your own, but that you relied upon others. The questions are believed to be important enough to claim your personal consideration and judgment.

Clearly your department has no lawful power to assess postage rates upon any domestic mail matter except as authorized by statute.

In order to determine the class to which any mail matter belongs, regulations and rulings, not inconsistent with the law, have the force of law. Regulations and rulings inconsistent with the law have no legal force.

In determining what shall constitute compliance with the law of mailable matter of the second class, reasonable rules and regulations fixing limitations upon what may enter into the composition of a legitimate list of subscribers and what shall constitute designed primarily for free circulation—the mailings of sample copies—are necessary. Similar rules and regulations are necessary to determine when, after admission of a publication to the second class, it should be rejected from that class because of noncompliance with the law. This is the precise question determined in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, Conant v. Postmaster General (equity 24361), and in the Lewis Publishing Co. v. Frank Wyman, in the Circuit Court of the United States in the Eastern District of Missouri (No. 5417). These are the only adjudicated cases.

In neither case was the question of assessing the rate in the act of 1884 upon any copies mailed by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication while the publication was of the second class considered.

But the right of your department to limit a publisher's mailings at the pound rate under the act of 1885, while his publication is "of the second class," no decision to the contrary having been made up to the time of mailing, and to assess against an excess of the limitations the nonpublishers' rate in the act of 1884, is a separate question and stands by itself.

Truly, as a matter of practice, publishers were permitted to voluntarily pay the rate fixed in the act of 1884 on occasional excesses of th limitations, such voluntary payment being in a nature of a compromise and in lieu of a citation and threatened disturbance of second-class status of their publications because of violation of the limitations. But never before this case had the privileges of a publisher to mail at the pound rate been arbitrarily suspended and the rate in 1884 arbitrarily assessed against copies mailed by that publisher on his own account and from the office of publication while the publication was "of the second class."

It is specially provided by the act of 1901 that when a publication has been accorded second-class mail privileges, the same shall not be suspended or annulled until a hearing shall have been granted to the parties interested. This must mean that the right to mail at the pound rate belongs to the publisher up to the time your department gives the hearing and makes a decision that his publication is not of the second class.

The penalty of exclusion from the second class after a hearing for violation of the limitations, or for other noncompliance with the law, is the only penalty your department can, it is believed, impose under the law and the court decisions last referred to.

I quote for your information the following three statutes:

"All publications of the second class, * * * when sent by the publisher thereof, and from the office of publication, including sample copies, * * * shall be entitled to transmission through the mails at 1 cent a pound or fraction thereof." (Act of 1885.)

The omitted words have no bearing.

"The rate of postage on newspaper and periodical publications of the second class, when sent by others than the publisher or news agent, shall be 1 cent for each 4 ounces or fractional part thereof, and shall be fully prepaid by postage stamps affixed to said matter." (Act of 1884.)

"When any publication has been accorded second-class mail privileges, the same shall not be suspended or annulled until a hearing shall have been granted to the parties interested." (Act of 1901.)

The $29,550 which you state in your letter of July 5 was "justly and lawfully demandable" must have been taken from the company under authority of some statute or statutes. The foregoing are all I have been able to find, and they appear to contradict that statement.

The assessment appears to have been accomplished by reading limitations into the pound-rate act of 1885, and assessing upon an alleged excess of those limits the transient rate in 1884. The local postmaster notified the company to that effect April 6, 1906. The company appealed to the department at Washington, and asked for a hearing.

At the hearing (April 30 and May 1, 1906) the company did not raise the question of law—that is, did not then question the right of the department to limit its mailings at the pound rate. It contested solely the question of fact, and believed that it had not exceeded the limits fixed and that the investigation which followed the hearing and was a part of it would so disclose. Subsequently, the Third Assistant, whose duty it was to decide, found and determined, from an exhaustive investigation by his officers, that the limits were not exceeded. Thereupon, the then Postmaster General suppressed the findings and decision of the Third Assistant's office and issued his own decision to the contrary, namely, that the limits were exceeded. This was on March 4, 1907—10 months after the hearing. As your letter of July 5 is understood, you approve and adhere to the conclusion that the limits were exceeded as decided by the Postmaster General. Without stating the law to support your conclusions, you also say that the money taken from the company at the transient rate on those alleged excess mailings was "justly and lawfully demandable." Accepting for the purposes of statement that the limitations were exceeded, these questions of law arise:

First, the publications being "of the second class" (whether by reason of a "temporary permit" or "certificate of entry" is immaterial), did the statute or statutes from which the department drew its authority include authority to fix limitations upon subscribers' copies and sample copies? We say no.

Second, assuming the foregoing to be decided in the affirmative (the contrary would foreclose all further questions against the department in favor of the company), did the statute or statutes from which the department drew its authority include authority to assess a rate for "others than the publisher" upon any copies whatever, whether excess or not, sent by the publisher? We say no.

Third, assuming both the foregoing questions to be decided in the affirmative, did the statute or statutes from which the department drew its authority to act in both those matters include authority to so act in advance of a hearing and a decision thereon as provided by the act of 1901? We say no.

We answer all three questions of law in the negative. If we are right on any one, the case is ours. As to the first proposition let us point out these circumstances:

(1) The language of the statute itself gives publishers an unlimited privilege while their publications are of the second class.

(2) The regulations of 1887, drawn and published, first following the act of Congress, state specifically that there is no limitation upon sample copies. Those of 1902 fix limits only for the purpose of determining whether or not a publication is of the second class.

(3) In a later circular issued to publishers on the "Salvation" case it is stated specifically that there is no limitation upon the number of sample copies.

(4) The congressional committee, composed of lawyers, in Document 608, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, said committee being appointed to consider and report to Congress on the provisions of existing law in relation to second-class matter, states that the statute gives publishers an "unlimited sample privilege."

(5) The act of 1901 forbids the suspension or annulment of the second-class privileges until a hearing shall have been granted to the parties interested.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, your department, while the publications were of the second class, did on April 6, 1906, without a hearing, suspend in part the privilege of the company to mail samples at the pound rate. Upon alleged excesses of those limits, without a hearing, the rate in the act of 1884 for "others than the publisher" was assessed. The company paid the rate under protest, and appealed from the action of the local postmaster. It was on that appeal that the hearing of April 30 and May 1 was given. This was after the suspension had taken place. No decision was made on that hearing until 10 months after. Then it was made retroactive to cover the first suspension, without the hearing required by law to be given prior to suspension. It was on this retroactive ruling that the $29,550 paid under protest at the transient rate in that act of 1884 was taken from the company. This was done at the very time that your department declared the publications not to be of the second class at all.

In order that the taking of this money be lawful, the department must have had authority to read into the act of 1885 limitations upon the publishers' pound-rate privilege; upon an excess of the limitations it must have had authority to assess the rate in the act of 1884; and it must have had the authority to proceed as it did without a hearing as provided by the act of 1901. Where was, and where is that authority? Certainly not in the three statutes quoted.

You must concede the righteousness of the following conclusions from the decisions referred to and the laws quoted.

First, that your department had the right under sections 10 and 14 of the act of 1879 to limit what should enter into the composition of a legitimate list of subscribers and the number of sample copies to be mailed for the purpose of determining whether either publication was in the first place of the second class; or after entry, whether either should be rejected, after a hearing, from that class.

Second, that your department had no power or authority to limit or suspend in whole or in part the privilege of the company to mail at the pound rate while the publications were of the second class, under the act of 1885, "until" a hearing had been granted, as required by the act of 1901.

Third, that your department had no power to assess the rate for "others than the publisher" in the act of 1884 on any copies whatever, sent by the publisher and from the office of publication, whether or not the department had the right to suspend in whole or in part the pound-rate privilege before or after a hearing. Congress ordained that the rates for matter of the second-class should depend upon whom the sender should be; one is for the "publisher thereof" and the other is for "others than the publisher." They are not interchangeable by "any sort of device" of construction.

Now, therefore, unless there be some other statute or statutes than those herein quoted to justify your statement that the rate in the act of 1884 was "justly and lawfully demandable" upon the copies in question which were sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication, while the publications were of the second class, the error of your decision is plain. The acts, fixing rates, standing alone are flatly opposed to such a conclusion. The act of 1901 is also opposed to such a conclusion, for it is certain that if the privilege of a publisher may not be suspended in whole without a hearing, it may not be suspended in part without a hearing. Under the act of 1901, alone, if no others were involved, and assuming your department had power to suspend the pound rate upon excess copies and to impose the transient rate upon them, the suspension could take effect only from the hour of judgment following the hearing precisely as did the decision that the publications were not "of the second class" take effect from the time of the decision, not before.

In this letter the question of fact—that is, the question as to whether or not excess copies were actually mailed, as held in the decision of the Postmaster General dated March 4, 1907—is not discussed, but such is not to be understood as admitted to be the fact. This letter presents the questions of law only. Your letter of July 5 states: "I caused a full investigation to be made into the state of facts upon which this postage was collected." That is taken as putting you in the position of accepting the facts as to mailings in excess of the limits as stated in the Postmaster General's letter of March 4, 1907. Then you say that the postage on those excess copies was "justly and lawfully demandable." This is another matter, and it puts you in the position of interpreting the law and applying it as he did. It is upon this question of law that we ask a reconsideration.

A large sum of money is at stake. If it belongs lawfully (that is, by reason of some statute) to the Government, the people I represent do not expect it back. If it does not, according to some statute, belong to the Government, it is theirs, and they do expect it back, and regard you as in honor bound to return it to them under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1905. As the matter stands, these people believe that the money was taken from them, not only without warrant of law, but in direct violation of law, and contrary to all previous practice of the department. It was a punishment inflicted upon them for exercising the right of free speech in criticism of the acts of the then Postmaster General. They are smarting under what they believe to be a gross injustice inflicted upon them.

In conclusion, I say that no impartial person but will admit that under the statutes quoted which give the company its privileges and protect it in them, and from which your department must draw whatever authority it had to curtail those privileges, in whole or in part, I have shown that up to the moment the decision was made that the publications were not "of the second class" the company had beyond successful dispute an unlimited privilege at the pound rate; and that whether it had or had not an unlimited privilege, it was an unwarranted act for your department to read into the law power to assess upon any copies whatever sent by the company for itself the rate for "others than the publisher," while the publications were of the second class. That act constituted both violent misapplication and total disregard of law.

If you do not agree with me and adhere to your decision of July 5, which appears to have been based upon advice (and which advice is, I believe, now shown to be unsound as to law), I beg you to frankly inform me of the statute or statutes upon which you base your decision, whether it be these quoted or others. To say, as you did July 5, that the money was taken "upon grounds of which the company was at the time fully advised," is not to identify the statute giving authority to take it. It could properly be taken only by authority of some statute. The Postmaster General, in his letter of March 4, 1907, in which the "grounds" are stated, does not identify that statute. Neither do the alleged suits in which the "questions involved" are supposed to be stated, and to which on July 29 you refer, identify the statute giving such authority.

The thousands of people who compose this company hope you personally intend to be just and deal fairly with them; that you will not turn your back upon the dawn, and that you will appreciate the very trying circumstances in which they are placed. Rightly or wrongly, they believe they have been taken advantage of by those in authority, and wronged. You made a "full investigation" of this matter. The moral obligation now rests upon you to right the wrong or show plainly that it is not a wrong. The honor of the Government is in the balance.

An early response will be much appreciated.

Respectfully submitted.

EDWIN C. MADDEN,
For the Company.

The foregoing letter brought the following response. It speaks for itself:

WASHINGTON, October 1, 1910.

EDWIN C. MADDEN, Esq.,
The Lewis Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

SIR: Replying to your letter of August 13, written for the Lewis Publishing Co., in which you request to be advised of the particular statute upon which the Post Office Department based its action in declining, under date of July 5, 1910, to refund to the company the sum of $29,550 postage collected at the St. Louis post office during the months of April, May, June, and July, 1906, on copies of the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal mailed in excess of the legitimate lists of subscribers and an equal number sent as samples, you are again advised that the grounds of the Government's claim to the sum in question, together with other amounts accruing in like manner from October 1, 1905, to March 5, 1907, are set forth in its several declarations of complaint in three civil suits now pending adjudication in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, at St. Louis, Mo., which pleadings appear of public record, and to which you are respectfully referred for a complete statement of the Government's several contentions, including the law and a summary of the facts in the pending judicial controversies with the Lewis Publishing Co.

Very respectfully,

F. H. HITCHCOCK, Postmaster General.

The United States Supreme Court is our final arbiter on questions of law. That court has held that every act of the head of a department, or of one of his subordinates, must be founded upon some law. The criminal indictments, the civil suits, and the taking of the money for "excess" postage must, therefore, be founded upon some law. That law must have fixed a limit upon the number of copies which the company might mail at a cent a pound, and required on an excess of the limit, if there were one, "excess" postage.

The company alleges the indictments were frauds, because no law placed any limit upon the number of copies it might mail at a cent a pound; that the civil suits are spurious, because no law placed any limit upon the number of copies it might mail at a cent a pound; that its money was taken as "excess" postage, not only without warrant of law, but in violation of law and on a false statement of facts.

As the correspondence printed herewith shows, great effort was made to ascertain the statutes upon which the official conduct was based. The Postmaster General's letter of July 29, replying to the direct request for information as to the statutes, did not state. His last letter of October 1, responding to a further request, was equally as evasive. The Attorney General did not respond at all.

The official papers in neither the indictments nor the civil suits disclose the statutory basis for them. Neither does the Postmaster General's letters of March 4, 1907, which assessed the "excess" postage, identify the law upon which his action was based. Neither does any book of the United States stautes disclose laws upon which such indictments and such civil suits might be based and this "excess" postage might be required.

The writer of this article administered for eight years in the department all the postage-rate laws, and asserts of his positive knowledge that there is no such "form of the statute," as alleged in the criminal indictments and in the civil suits; and that in the whole scheme of our postal laws no such thing appears as a limit upon the number of pieces mailable at any rate of any class, and that there is no such thing known in postal history as "excess" mailing or "excess" postage.

But here is further evidence that no such statutes exist. In sustaining the demurrer to the first of the criminal indictments, Mr. Justice Trieber, among other things, said:

"It will be noticed that there is no limitation in the act of March 3, 1885, as to the number of copies of such publications which may be sent through the mails at second-class rates, nor does the act limit copies to subscribers solely, but grants the privilege to all 'publications' of the second class, including sample copies. * * * It (the indictment) fails to allege anything which warrants the conclusion that legally the publishers could not transmit through the mails all the copies which they did send. There is nothing to indicate why these copies were in excess of the number of copies which they were legally entitled to transmit at the rate of 1 cent per pound."

According to the theory of our Constitution and laws, the Postmaster General and the Attorney General are servants of the people, not masters. They hold their offices merely to execute the people's laws, enacted through their representatives in Congress. A discreditable act by one of them discredits the President who appointed him, discredits the Government which he represents, and the people whose Government it is. If, in truth, there be a statute in existence justifying the indictments and the civil suits in this case and justifying the taking of the "excess" postage, both the Postmaster General and the Attorney General were as "representatives" in honor bound, when called upon, to promptly and fairly disclose it. Neither did so.

But there is another phase of this matter. Suppose some statute did authorize a limitation upon the company's mailings; suppose the limitation was violated; suppose the civil suits to collect back postage were justified, how has the Government's interests been guarded? If those suits were now, after these years of standing, pressed to trial and the Government were successful in securing a judgment, it would be valueless. The years of relentless "war" upon the company, recited only in small part here, has so disabled and crippled it that the effect would probably be to force it into bankruptcy, and so complete the ruin of this legitimate and once highly profitable enterprise of 18,000 persons, valued in millions.

If such usurpations of power as those shown here may go unrebuked, our justice is a mere trick and our Government honor a travesty. A citizen's good name, earned by a lifetime of proper living and dealing, may in a moment be stained forever by the solemn indictment of a United States grand jury, charging to be criminal an act most lawful; on forged law and false facts he may be robbed of his money; and his private business may be destroyed by the long-standing menace of spurious suits brought in the good name of the United States.

In the light of this whole case one may well ask the value of the constitutional Bill of Rights; of "the freedom of speech or of the press"; * * * and the right to "petition the Government for a redress of grievances"; of the "right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized"; of the promise that no person shall be deprived of property "without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation"; of the promise that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right of a speedy and public trial"; of the assurance that "he (the President) shall take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed"; and the value of the oath: "I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and to the best of my ability execute, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

All these amount to nothing when scheming officials, having in their control a great spy system, design to use their public offices to "war" on a citizen or an institution. In Mexico the people are now endeavoring to "rescue liberty" from such abuses of power.

Whether the acts of the present Attorney General and the present Postmaster General, as shown by the correspondence printed herein, involves them in the conspiracy of ruin of which the company complains is a question by itself. Whether the tactics employed by both to avoid an answer to the inquiry for the law which justified their official acts were adopted to shield their predecessors may or may not be of importance.

But, apart from these questions and standing by itself, the correspondence shows indisputable transactions for which those officers are responsible. Both are servants of the people, and the honor of the people required them to deal frankly and fairly in a matter of such vital importance. Neither did so. One makes no response at all to the inquiry for the law upon which the civil suits were based, the other resorts to the shifty trick of sending the company to the "pleadings" in those suits to ascertain the law upon which its money was held to be "justly and lawfully demandable," well knowing that those pleadings do not disclose that information.

To such state has the honor of Cabinet ministers come. In either case all honest men will regard the act dishonest, a breach of high trust, a blot of bad faith upon the good name of the Government. It ought to be, and may be, sufficient ground to warrant impeachment for malfeasance and moral unfitness for public office.

The matter is respectfully submitted for the information of the Congress of the United States. The hope is expressed that at least it will be placed in the public record for the enlightenment of the people on the state of the public service.

EDWIN C. MADDEN,
Attorney in Fact for Lewis Publishing Co.

APRIL 12, 1911.

STATE OF MISSOURI, County of St. Louis, ss:

I, Edwin C. Madden, being duly sworn, do depose and say that I have carefully compared the correspondence printed in this pamphlet with the carbon copies of my letters to the President, the Department of Justice, and the Post Office Department, and with the original letters from those Departments, and that they are true copies thereof.

EDWIN C. MADDEN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of April, 1911.

[SEAL.] D. COHEN,
Notary Public for the County of St. Louis, Mo.

My commission expires March 21, 1915.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, out of order, I desire to offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, out of order, the Senator from Arkansas introduces the following resolution and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The Secretary will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 53), as follows:

Whereas widespread complaints are made as to the management of the Post Office Department under the administration of the present Postmaster General, in almost every department of the service, said complaints coming not only from the public at large but from the employees of the Government in the postal service generally; and

Whereas on the 10th day of May, 1911, said Postmaster General made to the Senate what he terms an answer to the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 10th day of April, 1911, regarding the alleged misuse of his office against the Woman's National Weekly, a publication of the city of St. Louis, State of Missouri, and the Harpoon, of Denver, Colo.; and

Whereas the correctness of said answer and its truthfulness has been called in question: Be it therefore

Resolved, That said resolution, together with the answer of the Postmaster General thereon, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which said committee is hereby authorized and directed to make a complete and thorough investigation of the entire post-office system, and more especially as to the facts contained in said answer to said resolution, and report their findings to the Senate at as early a date as possible. Said committee is hereby authorized and empowered and directed to subpœna witnesses, to sit during the present session of Congress or during adjournment, at their convenience, to employ whatever clerical force is necessary, and the expenses of same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. The resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the statute the resolution must first go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and that reference will be made.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, some of the statements of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] are of such an extraordinary nature that I am unwilling to allow them to pass unchallenged. I shall not, however, devote my time to an expression of opinion as to his accusations against certain officials. I think they can take care of themselves, and, in any event, their records speak for them. I desire to devote my attention to his allegations of fact.

It must be evident to all of us that never has there been a more noticeable disposition to find fault with officials than there is to-day. Some of these criticisms arise from a disposition to improve public service, others to gratify the wish of constituents and friends; and I am glad to ascribe to the Senator from Arkansas motives resting upon one of these two reasons. At times, however, this criticism springs from a desire to make political capital; then, too, it comes frequently from those who are always making a noise. I would not for a moment stand in the way of any fair investigation of any department of the Government, however close that investigation might cut to the bone. Let dishonesty and inefficiency be exposed and promptly and properly punished. But, Mr. President, the efficiency of our Government—not alone the respect for it—is very much impaired by reckless criticism. Such attacks have another deplorable effect. They encourage a disposition to disobey the law and to disregard those who are called upon to administer it. In this atmosphere of carping complaints the policeman to many citizens is a hobgoblin and every judge is a Jeffreys.

So I say, we should be fair to officials, not merely to give due credit to those who deserve it, but also in order to render efficient the whole framework of our administration.

THE RESOLUTION.

What is this resolution to which I wish to call attention? First, I desire to read the resolution, and then I wish to reduce to the lowest terms and to the simplest language the occasion of this controversy. The resolution as introduced by the Senator from Arkansas is couched in these words:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be required and directed to furnish to the Senate copy of the rulings of his department, and his reasons therefor, in regard to the circulation of the Woman's National Weekly; also the Harpoon, of Denver, two newspapers published in the United States, inasmuch as serious charges are made against said rulings, as is shown by letter attached and made a part of this resolution; that said information be furnished to the Senate at the earliest possible convenience of the department.

To that resolution is attached a letter of an exceedingly abusive nature.

THE HARPOON.

I call attention first to the fact that not one word has been said here about any ruling as to the Harpoon, one of these two periodicals. Why? Because in that part of the resolution the chase was after a phantom. The Harpoon is to-day enjoying the full second-class mail privilege, without any restraint by the Post Office Department.

THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL WEEKLY.

Now, what is the fact in regard to the Woman's National Weekly?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I have direct information from the editor of the Harpoon that they have been interfered with and are being interfered with and seriously crippled by the unlawful and unauthorized action of the Postmaster General. I have it on my desk.

Mr. BURTON. I think the Senator from Arkansas will find that this interference has not been by the Post Office Department, but by another department of the Government, with which any citizen is liable to be involved, and that is the Department of Justice. I can hardly understand why the Senator from Arkansas should not have called attention to the regulations in regard to second-class matter if there had been anything in them in any way affecting the Harpoon.

Mr. President, I am informed not only that there has been no interference with the Harpoon, but that it received the second-class mail privilege within two or three days after its first issue.

Now we come to the Woman's National Daily. It appears that this periodical, now published weekly, has a circulation of about 400,000 copies. It appeared upon investigation by the usual tests that approximately one-fourth of its circulation was not of such a nature as to entitle it to the second-class mail privilege.

We have heard much of an embargo of 17 cents a pound. I do not know from what source that comes. The Woman's National Weekly is being circulated to the number of approximately 300,000 copies at a cent a pound and approximately 100,000 copies at a cent for 4 ounces, or 4 cents a pound.

REASONS FOR THE RULING.

What is the reason for this distinction? Widespread complaints came to the Postmaster General from all over the country that post offices were, I may say, almost congested with copies of this paper, which arrived in the mails and were either rejected by those to whom they were addressed or were addressed to persons who could not be located. A large selection of these letters is given in the answer of the Postmaster General of the hundreds of like letters received at the department. I will read a few of them, and I ask unanimous consent to insert other typical letters which will describe the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. BURTON. The postmaster at Adrian, Minn., in reporting the receipt of a large number of undeliverable copies at his office, says:

None of these people subscribed for, and many refuse to take it out of the office. They are not marked "Sample copy." I think the whole Northwest is flooded with them. The price is $1 per year. Who pays for it? Does anybody?

The postmaster at Los Angeles, Cal., incloses a list of the addresses of 132 refused copies of the paper, and states that—

"Refused" cards have been frequently issued by this office on these copies, but no attention seems to be paid to these notifications.

One of the postal laws provides that when a copy of a newspaper arrives at a post office and is not called for, the postmaster shall notify the publisher of that fact.

This office solicits the assistance of your department in securing the discontinuance of the receipt of these copies here.

This does not sound very much like a conspiracy against the Woman's National Weekly, when the postmaster of the second city on the Pacific coast writes to the department soliciting its assistance to secure the discontinuance of such copies received there.

Under date of September 7, 1910, the deputy postmaster general of Canada reported that, although repeatedly notified, the publishers failed to discontinue undeliverable copies addressed to persons at Williamstown, New Brunswick.

Again:

The postmaster at Battle Creek, Mich., informed the department that he had notified the publishers of the refusal of the publication by 14 persons at his office, adding:

We have never succeeded in getting a paper stopped on one request, and the above list comprises those which have been sent in weekly since the fore part of January (five weeks) and were still coming at the end of last week.

Oh, it is said but these are gifts to relatives, that a father wants to give something to his daughter of that kind. That is the implication, but, Mr. President, that is not the case, save in a few rare instances. The difference between the subscriptions held by the Post Office Department to be illegitimate and bona fide gift subscriptions is clear and marked. If I make a bona fide gift of a subscription to a publication to another—some relative, for instance—I give the subscription because I wish that relative to read what the publication contains. In other words, in harmony with the spirit of the statute which grants this nominal rate of postage, I pay for the subscription in order that my relative may be informed and may keep abreast of the current information of the world as disseminated by that publication. My relative, complimented, is glad to receive the publication, and consequently he will in some unmistakable manner ratify my act in subscribing for him. With legitimate publications the number of these bona fide gift subscriptions is always small when compared with the number of subscriptions obtained in other ways. Such publications are usually circulated, as we know, in response to the orders of individuals and through newsdealers. The Post Office Department has always recognized bona fide gift subscriptions as legitimate.

What have we in the case of the Woman's National Weekly? Vast numbers of alleged gift subscriptions—over 50 per cent of all the copies circulated, according to the department's finding, and 70 per cent according to the publisher. How were these subscriptions ruled against obtained? Women, eager for the great benefits held out by the publisher, such as membership in the American Woman's League, paid for these subscriptions. Why? Was it to send the paper because of its informing or literary value? No, save, as I have said, in few rare instances. They paid for these subscriptions, Mr. President, not as bona fide gifts, but for selfish reasons, namely, in order that they might send in the requisite number of subscriptions and obtain the promised benefits. They had the publication sent to mere acquaintances, often to persons they did not know, whose names they procured in various ways. The recipients of the publication did not want it. They did not in any way assent to or ratify the acts of the persons subscribing for them. On the contrary, they disavowed their acts by refusing the publication or failing to take it from the post offices. The publisher recognizes this, for in an editorial in the April 29, 1911, issue of the Woman's National Weekly he says:

You have a perfect right to make a gift of one or more subscriptions where this is done in good faith, but the indiscriminate presentation of subscriptions to persons whom you may not even know, for the purpose of gaining some reward or prize for yourself, is not legitimate subscription business.

This American Woman's League I have mentioned is a plan of the publisher. Fifty-two dollars is the amount paid for membership, either in cash or subscriptions to the Woman's National Weekly, or to certain other designated periodicals. The publisher's ambitious scheme is to secure 1,000,000 ladies in the United States to pay $52,000,000 into the fund. It was held out that membership would entitle the holders to numerous privileges, among them instruction in a so-called university. The league was launched, I understand, with a loud blare of trumpets, but now many of its promised privileges have not materialized and its university has shrunk to a correspondence school, in which instruction is given, not at the league's headquarters at University City, but by mail, by instructors in existing correspondence schools. The names of the teachers in these schools were catalogued without their consent, and as a consequence many of them have refused to accept the designation of instructors in the university of the league. I will have more to say about this American Woman's League.

If a paper is a gift, it is perfectly proper to put it on the regular subscription list. But, Mr. President, the rule is well established and anyone can see that there must be a contractual relation between the publisher of the paper and the addressee; that the latter must pay his money for it, or else he must receive the paper when it comes to him. It is in a sense immaterial how the money is paid, but there must be that element of contractual relationship between the sender of the paper and the one who receives it. I mean by the sender, in this case, the publisher. There must be an unequivocal expression of intention or of desire on the part of the addressee to receive the paper.

Now, here is another letter on this subject, selected from a large number:

FOREST GROVE, OREG., January 17, 1910.

The LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.,
University City, St. Louis, Mo.

GENTLEMEN: Your card, bearing date of December 27, 1909, and stating that a subscription in my name to the Woman's National Daily has been "paid in advance by a Mrs. H. Marnach," was forwarded to me some time ago from North Yamhill, Oreg., my former address, but I have been too busy to notice the matter before.

Permit me to say that I do not know the person whom you name and never before heard of her existence. I do not stand for any act that she may make in my name, and I have no use for your publications.

I send your card and a copy of this letter to the postal authorities at Washington.

CHAS. F. TORRANCE.

That was sent to the publisher, and the following was sent to the department:

To the POSTMASTER GENERAL, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The above and the inclosure are self-explanatory, and may, perhaps, be of interest to your department. Such liberties by publishers should be checked.

CHAS. F. TORRANCE.

The Senator from Arkansas seems to lay great stress upon the fact that there is no such place as Oak Ridge, Ill., from which the Postmaster General states, in his answer to the resolution, the postmaster reported to the department the receipt of undeliverable copies. That is a typographical error. The post office referred to is Oak Park, Ill.

THE RULING WAS LEGAL.

But it is maintained that there existed a second-class mail privilege which could not be removed; and, at great length, the Senator from Arkansas has argued that this publication having been given the second-class privilege, this full privilege can not be removed without a hearing or some other action, and in support of his contention he read Postal Regulation No. 443.

The argument has been made that a mere change in title from daily to weekly does not require an application for a reentry. This is the way in which the regulation reads:

In case of a change of name or of the regular periods of issue of a publication—

That is, if it is changed from a monthly to a weekly, or, as in this case, from a daily to a weekly—entered as second-class matter, or the removal of its known office of publication to another post office, the postmaster shall require the publisher to apply for reentry.

So, when a change was made several months ago in periodicity from a daily to a weekly it was not only the postmaster's right but his duty to require an application for a reentry. It changed the whole nature of the publication. It made it altogether different from what it was before.

THE REAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

There are two points that I think are worthy of consideration as legal propositions. If an issue were joined upon these points in good faith, I should feel that they ought to be decided by the courts. As regards the first one, however, there has been a decision by the minor courts in favor of the contention of the Post Office Department.

The two questions are: First, when there is a claimed subscription list, say, of 400,000 copies, can you separate it and say that the legitimate part is entitled to be mailed at the second-class rate of 1 cent a pound and the remaining illegitimate part must pay the rate of 1 cent for 4 ounces, or 4 cents a pound?

The second question is whether it is lawful by tests involving less than the whole claimed subscription list to determine what the proportion is in the whole subscription list between legitimate and nonlegitimate subscriptions. Now, this is the reading of the statute:

A newspaper or other periodical publication must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

The Senate will understand the point I am making. The courts thus far have sustained the department in the ruling that the legitimate part of the subscription list of a publication can be regarded as entitled to the second-class rate of 1 cent a pound and the illegitimate part to the highest second-class rate, and until that decision is overturned the Post Office Department is performing its duty in saying that 100,000 copies must pay what is called the transient second-class rate of 4 cents a pound, while the 300,000 copies go at a cent a pound.

ARE SUBSCRIPTION TESTS FAIR?

Another question is this: Is there entire legal justification for a ratio test of a subscription list? That is, in the first investigation made, out of 300,000 copies then being sent, investigation was made as to 3,000, selected at random from the publishers' records. Of those 3,000 it was found that 24 per cent were sent to persons who stated that they were not subscribers. Can you apply that 24 per cent of the 3,000 to the whole 300,000?

The making of a subscription test by query letters has long been followed by the department, and its use has been fully justified as a means of furnishing correct and satisfactory evidence as to the condition of a subscription list and other matters pertaining to second-class mail publications. The procedure is to take at random from the mailing list of a publication a given number of names and to address to each claimed subscriber a letter containing such questions as tend to determine whether there is or has been any direct contractual relation between the subscriber and the publisher, and if so, how it was brought about and the particular facts and circumstances connected with it. This is no undue interference on the part of the Post Office Department with the rights of the subscriber, but is the mere asking of plain, respectful, lawful questions, the correct answers to which are more fully and correctly known to the subscriber than to any other person. It is no different from a request for information made in the ordinary course of business by one man of another, and it is entirely discretionary with the person of whom the inquiry is made whether he will reply. If he does not reply, the matter is pursued no further. Usually, however, the alleged subscriber is willing to give the desired information.

It has been the experience of the Post Office Department that the disclosures brought about by such queries have been the means of wisely guiding both the department and the publisher to a correct understanding, inducing the full cooperation of the latter, and resulting in the proper relations between the two, to wit, the publisher bringing the condition of his publication within the requirements of the law and regulations and the Post Office Department having the necessary facts before it to enable it to give him all the rights and benefits to which he is justly entitled.

In the case now before the Senate the long-established rules were adhered to, and the results seem to have had the effect of determining the relative relation of the subscribers to the Woman's National Weekly to the publishers. Of those replying to the queries of the department, at least 24 per cent made it quite clear that they were not, in any legal sense, a part of the "legitimate list of subscribers" such as is contemplated by the statute and such as is required under the interpretation and application of the Postal Laws and Regulations.

It can not be justly claimed by the publishers that any harm resulted to them by this action on the part of the department, since they claim that all subscriptions made to the Woman's National Weekly have been paid for and that their relations with the claimed subscribers have been open and aboveboard, and if this is the case, surely no injury can result either to the publishers or subscribers by a direct and full understanding of the way in which the list of claimed subscribers became such, if it is true that they sustain that relation to the publishers. As evidence of the fact that no new procedure was instituted, no new order of administrative affairs set up, reference is made to the records of numerous cases decided by the Post Office Department extending back for a number of years in which the same course was followed as in this case, resulting in amicable and proper settlement of the matters in dispute between the publishers and the Post Office Department. As instances of this, I name the following:

Publications.	Total claimed subscriptions.	Claimed subscriptions eliminated as illegitimate.	Per cent claimed subscriptions eliminated as illegitimate.
Every Woman's Magazine, New York, N. Y.	90,000	83,000	92
Missouri and Kansas Farmer, Kansas City, Mo.	61,687	53,687	87
Home Friend, Kansas City, Mo.	417,779	321,410	76
Welcome Guest, Portland, Me.	450,000	292,000	64
Household Journal, Springfield, Ohio.	176,363	108,792	61
Vick's Magazine, Chicago, Ill.	55,730	30,730	55
Orange Judd Northwest Farmstead, Springfield, Mass.	73,604	32,469	44
Die Deutsche Hausfrau, Milwaukee, Wis.	105,954	44,000	41
Farm News, Springfield, Ohio.	85,782	30,372	33
American Family Journal, Jersey City, N. J.	284,763	98,052	34
Farm Magazine, Omaha, Nebr.	59,235	13,940	23
Popular Fashions, Springfield, Mass.	266,462	52,327	19
Woman's Home Journal, Springfield, Mass.	263,195	44,735	17
Farmer, St. Paul, Minn.	103,660	16,629	16

I may remark here in passing that since this test was made another test has been made of a larger number, approximately 9,000 copies, and the proportion of illegitimate subscriptions instead of being 24 per cent was 40 per cent. On this I need only say it has been the unbroken custom of the department to follow these tests. This table shows the results of the second test.

WERE THE PUBLISHERS FULLY INFORMED AS TO WHICH WERE THE ILLEGITIMATE SUBSCRIPTIONS?

There is another point to which I desire to call your attention. The Senator from Arkansas argues as if a great hardship had been imposed upon the publishing company by charging them with the duty of finding out which of its subscriptions went to legitimate subscribers and which did not. How else can you enforce the law? Just see how easily it would be absolutely evaded. Suppose, for instance, a publication was established intended entirely as an advertising sheet, with 100,000 copies, that they made out a legitimate list of 1,000 copies and then turned over to an agent the matter of sending out the other 99,000 copies, and said, "We can not tell, we do not know, whether they go to the intended subscribers or not," you could nullify the law. There are other ways, but that is a good illustration of how the statute could be practically abrogated.

The Post Office Department indicated clearly to the publishers the particular class of alleged subscriptions that were objected to, the ground of the objection, and the necessary correction to be made. The publishers practically admitted the existence of the objections, as well as the free subscriptions, and stated that they were alike objectionable to them. However, they at all times failed to make any effort to eliminate these subscriptions from their list. They were definitely informed by the department that the particular subscriptions which could not be included as a part of the "legitimate list of subscribers" were those paid for by members of the American Woman's League, sent to persons whose consent they had not obtained, and whose acceptance was never secured, and who disclaimed being subscribers at all, and that in many instances these persons were annoyed by the receipt of the publication, not knowing whether an obligation of debt for a subscription to it would be contracted by receiving it, and were anxious to be relieved from the burden of the imposition. The publishers have, or should have, an order for each and every claimed subscription made in their application for reentry. The Post Office Department has no such means of knowledge regarding their subscription list.

They were informed that they could address the members of the American Woman's League, ascertain the names of the persons to whom they had given the subscriptions, and could then address them at their pleasure to ascertain the persons who objected to becoming subscribers to the publication. This way was pointed out most clearly to them and their cooperation with the department earnestly insisted upon, but they refused or neglected and still refuse or neglect to act in cooperation with the department. If the publishers do not know the eliminations to be made and the corrections insisted upon by the Post Office Department, it is their own willful fault and they can blame no one but themselves.

ILLEGITIMATE LIST RESULT OF PUBLISHERS' METHODS.

The publishers have so conducted their business relations with the public as to encourage the payment for large numbers of copies by persons desiring to become members of the American Woman's League, to be sent to persons not wanting the publication and who are unwilling to be regarded as subscribers. The persons thus encouraged to pay for copies do so not because of any desire to confer a benefit upon those to whom the copies are to be sent, but for a commercial purpose—that is, in order to pay for their membership fee in the American Woman's League, or to interest the recipient in the American Woman's League, or some of the other schemes of E. G. Lewis, textually advertised in the publication, or that the donor might obtain prizes or premiums for sending in a given number of paid subscriptions, such premiums being, for instance, membership in the American Woman's League, shares of stock in the University Heights Realty & Development Co., the United States Fiber Co., or in other Lewis concerns.

The notices or advertisements in the paper in regard to the club subscriptions were worded in such a way as to suggest or encourage "gift" subscriptions—that is, that the person paying for them send in the names of persons and sufficient money from his own pocket to pay for the subscriptions.

The case of a person paying for subscriptions for the purposes above stated is analogous to that of a merchant who, having an advertisement in a publication, pays for 1,000 or more copies there and requests the publisher to send them to persons whose names he furnishes. The copies thus paid for by the merchant are clearly for advertising purposes, and the persons to whom they are sent are in no sense subscribers to the publication.

Again, I wish to read a letter from Mr. Lewis, with whom I have some personal acquaintance——

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it interrupt the Senator if I were to ask him a question there?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it the claim that you can penalize the entire publication because a percentage of it is sent out in this manner?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; 300,000 copies go out at the second-class rate of 1 cent a pound.

Mr. HEYBURN. If this is a publication within the provisions of the postal laws, does it penalize the entire paper and its issue because a portion of them was sent out in violation of the postal laws?

Mr. BURTON. Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, I mean, by means of issuing a fraud order the department would exclude from the mails the legitimate as well as the illegitimate. Is that the purpose of the decision?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; nothing of the kind. There has been no fraud order. Every copy goes to the person to whom it is addressed. There is no delay, except that the publisher is compelled to pay on one-fourth 4 cents a pound, and even that matter is held for further consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is penalizing it. You are requiring a portion of the issue to be paid at one rate and another portion at a different rate. Is that the status now?

Mr. BURTON. That portion upon which the higher rate is required can not be included, in the language of the law, in the "legitimate list of subscribers."

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no knowledge in regard to the charges that are made as to the character of the man or the character of the paper, but the statement of the legal proposition interested me and attracted my attention. It would seem to me that the Senator was contending for a rule of law which would permit the Postmaster General to forbid the mails to a publication because a part of its circulation——

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no. I probably did not make that clear, and I will repeat my statement. The Postmaster General does not penalize any of the subscriptions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not penalizing it to charge a larger rate for one portion than for another?

Mr. BURTON. No. The term "penalize" means something more than keeping out of the mails. Twenty-four per cent, or one-fourth, pays at the second-class rate of 4 cents a pound, because it does not go to legitimate subscribers. The other three-fourths is thought to reach legitimate subscribers, and pays the ordinary second-class rate of 1 cent a pound.

Mr. HEYBURN. How would that affect the papers that are sent out under the very prevailing system of voting subscriptions for papers, where some one writes you, "Will you not, please, subscribe for a certain paper, and by doing so I will benefit; I will get a piano; I will get something." That seems to be quite a practice.

Mr. BURTON. Personally I take it there could be no case in which, when the initiative was with the person who received the paper, it would be other than a legitimate subscription.

Mr. HEYBURN. The initiative in that case——

Mr. BURTON. This is a case where the paper is sent to persons who do not want it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That, of course, is a serious question, and I am not unobservant of that proposition. Still, it seemed to me that the same legal proposition would apply. Just how much a person desires a newspaper could hardly be determined. Some of us subscribe for papers and do not value them very highly afterwards.

Mr. BURTON. The desire would be exemplified by taking it out of the office or recognizing its receipt.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have only been interested in this because of the legal question that is presented. As I understand the decision to which the Senator referred, it was that they could forbid the mails to these papers upon the second-class basis.

Mr. BURTON. They could, on a second-class basis of 1 cent a pound.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is penalizing them; that is requiring more for one part than another. It is a question that ought to be looked into very carefully. There is no question about that.

Mr. BURTON. As I have already stated, some of the minor courts have decided that question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the Senator so to state.

Mr. BURTON. Now, Mr. Lewis himself recognized this position. He wrote the following letter on the 28th of February, 1911, to the postmaster at St. Louis:

THE LEWIS PUBLISHING CO.,
University City, St. Louis, February 28, 1911.

Mr. T. J. AKINS,
Postmaster, St. Louis, Mo.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 27th, inclosing copy of a letter from Third Assistant Postmaster General of date of the 24th, we beg to state that we are thoroughly in accord with the department in this matter of gift subscriptions. No single other item causes us so much annoyance, expense, and trouble as the handling of these gift subscriptions.

We have endeavored in the past to eliminate this as much as possible by requiring those sending us gift subscriptions to make them out on a separate form of blank headed in large letters with a notice that they are gift subscriptions, and then by mailing promptly to each subscriber so reported a postal card notifying them of the fact that the subscription had been presented to them. So troublesome have these subscriptions been in the past, however, causing both the department and ourselves constant annoyance by the refusal of the papers, that we have decided hereafter to publish at the head of the editorial columns in the Woman's National Daily the inclosed notice, and will hereafter refuse to place any gift subscriptions on our list until the return half of the postal card has come back to us from the person to whom the gift has been made, advising us of the acceptance of the gift.

We would welcome a ruling by the department to that effect which would justify us and all other publishers in absolutely refusing gift subscriptions unless accompanied by the consent of the one to whom they were presented.

Very truly, yours, E. G. LEWIS, President.

I think there is some point in the fact that the publishers of the Woman's National Weekly are estopped from complaining, because they virtually admit in the letter I have just read that a portion of the subscription list is not legitimate, and because a copy of the notice which was carried in the editorial column——

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but I do not want to leave unfinished the suggestion I started to make. In a contest for a piano—and I merely used that for an illustration—sometimes the friends of a certain party will subscribe very largely in the last hours of a contest, the contest being published each day; they will subscribe probably for 40 copies in order to help out their friend, and they send a list of names to whom the 40 copies shall be sent. Now, is that illegitimate?

Mr. BURTON. If they do not receive them, if they do not want them, they are not legitimate subscribers. The test is a relation of quasi contract between the publisher and the addressee. A decision on this point was rendered by Judge Sherman, of the United States circuit court, in which he said:

> I would not wish to be understood as holding that the terms employed by the act, to wit, "bona fide and regular subscribers," were to be construed so strictly as only to embrace persons who by their own hand have made subscriptions; but it is quite plain that no one can be a subscriber unless he has subscribed himself or by some authorized agent, or has subsequently in some sufficient way ratified the subscription which may have been volunteered for him. It follows that the sending of newspapers without prepayment of postage to persons who have not subscribed themselves, nor by any authorized agent, or not subsequently ratified it, is not a sending to subscribers.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT SHOULD NOT BE BLAMED.

Now, the Senate understands the grave danger of the abuse of this second-class mail privilege, and I do not think it is quite fair to blame the officials of the Post Office Department, who endeavor to stay the abuses which are springing up on every hand. This Government of ours should give its support to those who adhere to the law and observe its provisions without making trouble or evading the law. In this case it is perfectly manifest that there is a disposition to send out a large share of the issues of the papers to people who do not care for it and in direct contravention of the law.

Mr. President, I should like to go over the history of this whole transaction. I have met Mr. Lewis and formed a favorable impression of him. If he is altogether wrong they can say of him, "A fairer person lost not heaven," but I am afraid he has a little too much diversity in his schemes and plans and that this newspaper is not the main enterprise in which he is interested. They are as numerous as the list that Bagehot gives of the absurd enterprises in which people were urged to invest about the year 1700, when the wheel of perpetual motion and a lot of other ridiculous things furnished the basis for the formation of stock companies.

THE LEWIS SCHEMES.

Here are a few of the concerns:

Development & Investment Co.
United States Fiber Stopper Co.

That is a very interesting plan, indeed. It was to conserve our natural resources by saving wood—to stop the use of corks and substitute a stopper made of paper. Thousands of persons subscribed for the stock of this company, but not one of them ever received a dividend. What is a little more to the point is that the paper stoppers were never put on the market. A statement was published in a prospectus of this concern that the patents had been sold abroad for $500,000, and, in fact, it appeared that they were sold for not even a single nickel. The statement, to say the least, was incorrect. When promoters become interested in enterprises they ascend into an atmosphere toward the heavens. They think these things are all so, and because of their sanguine disposition it is very hard to visit upon them the obloquy with which we should punish a designing rascal. They think in millions. The men of the Col. Sellers type are not all dead. I do not want to call down the highest degree of objurgation on Mr. Lewis, but I am inclined to think that the Post Office Department is thoroughly justified in keeping a pretty close watch on his business enterprises and his publications.

I will read the names of a few more of these concerns:

People's United States Bank.

I will come to that in a minute.

University City Bank.
People's Savings Trust Co.
American Woman's League.
University Heights Realty & Development Co.
People's University.
Woman's National Daily.
Lewis Addressing Machine Co.
Controller Co. of America.

The following concerns also appear to have been promoted by Mr. E. G. Lewis, but were not investigated by post-office inspectors:

Progressive Watch Co.
California Vineyards Co.
Hygienic Remedy Co.

I do not know whether that is a water cure or an ice cure, or what it is.

Chemical Freezer Co.
Anti-Cavity Co.

That is the natural complement of the United States Fiber Stopper Co. [Laughter.]

Clare Art Co.
Faultless Suspender Co.

And many others.

THE CHARACTER OF THE WOMAN'S NATIONAL WEEKLY.

I have copies of this publication here. It is not a very large paper. It does not weigh like the Daily Journal, and the difference between a cent a pound and 4 cents a pound amounts to but little per copy.

I find here a number of subjects that awaken popular interest. Here is an article over two columns, "The standing army." Here is another article over here, "Canada to the rescue." That is nearly two columns. Both of those are advertisements of Lewis's concerns. Then, here is another article, "The voice of Jacob, but—." A very large share of the paper is made up of attacks upon the Post Office Department. I am inclined to think, however, the department can take care of itself.

Now, that is the general nature of the publication. It is too closely associated with a number of the publisher's business enterprises. The full and complete purpose of E. G. Lewis in all his publication of magazines and newspapers is not to supply the public with information of an educative and informing character, nor to devote them to the development and popularizing of literature, art, science, or information relating to any particular industry, but the exploitation of his business schemes, the aggrandizement of Lewis, and the putting of money into his pocket through the sale of stock in the various doubtful projects which he has promoted, and of the capitalization of the emotions, sympathy, and energy of the good women of the country by holding up to them the glittering and alluring promises of clubhouses, dividends on money, cheap university courses, fine pieces of art, and trips from their homes to University City for the annual meeting of the Woman's League, where the principal part of the show is Lewis himself, and the airy and hollow promises which he makes to those whom he lures to that place.

If time and pains are taken briefly to scan the kind and character of the schemes devised by Lewis in the last 10 years, his purpose will be as clear as daylight, and there will no longer be any doubt as to why he is holding up his hands to the Congress of the United States begging for the return of alleged money which no one owes him; why he is appealing to the women of the country to swamp Representatives and Senators of this Congress with letters in his behalf, and to send petitions to the President of the United States and to the Postmaster General asking relief from persecutions and discriminations that never existed, except in his imagination. From the beginning to the end, the only object in the mind of E. G. Lewis has been the furtherance of his own selfish aims. He has been woefully slack of his promises. When overtaken in his plans to wring money from the people, he has immediately proceeded to beguile them into another net laid for them, and being overtaken in this, into another, and another still, until he has so intertwined and interwoven his schemes that the unwary and unsuspecting are absolutely unable to understand them, but are made to stand in awe of their apparent greatness and the amount of money invested in them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio will suspend for a moment. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

THE PEOPLE'S UNITED STATES BANK.

Mr. BURTON. Mention has been made of the famous bank. I would not mention that, Mr. President, except for the glowing eulogy pronounced upon it.

In 1904 what was known as the People's United States Bank was organized to transact all of its business by the use of the mails. The plan was to receive savings deposits, carry on a certified-check system, and do exclusively a mail-order banking business. Its offices were located at University City, a suburb of St. Louis, Mo. The bank was chartered under the laws of the State of Missouri in November of that year, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, half paid up. The articles of association were signed by 18 persons, 17 subscribing 5 shares each, and E. G. Lewis subscribing 9,915, making 10,000 shares in all. On December 12, 1904, the secretary of state satisfied himself by the examination required under the Revised Statutes that the requisite capital "had been paid in in cash," and the bank was accordingly permitted to commence business. About three months later this capital stock was increased in due form of law by $1,500,000, fully paid up, and a certificate of such increase issued, so that its capital stock finally amounted to $2,500,000, of which $2,000,000 were paid up. This capital had been furnished by some 60,000 persons scattered throughout the country.

E. G. Lewis was president of the bank and at the same time the dominating spirit as executive officer of two other corporations, the Lewis Publishing Co. and the University Heights Realty & Development Co. The development company confined its operations to speculating in real estate. The Lewis Publishing Co. issued two monthly publications, the Woman's Magazine and the Woman's Farm Journal, and both were used by Lewis to solicit subscribers to the bank's stock.

FRAUD ORDER ISSUED AGAINST THE BANK.

Complaint was made that E. G. Lewis and the officials of the People's United States Bank were using the mails for fraudulent purposes, and post-office inspectors were assigned to investigate the charges. Upon receipt and consideration of their report by the department a citation was sent to the officers and agents of the bank and E. G. Lewis to show cause why a fraud order should not be issued. A hearing was held upon such citation, and the Postmaster General, on July 6, 1905, upon the recommendation of the Assistant Attorney General for the Post Office Department, and after the Attorney General of the United States had rendered an opinion, issued a fraud order against the bank, its officers and agents as such, and E. G. Lewis. The order against the bank is still in force, but the order against Lewis was suspended on July 5, 1906.

WHY FRAUD ORDER WAS ISSUED.

I think it is well to read, in this connection, a little material from the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. It was not the decision of a Federal court that wound up this bank. It was a State court of Missouri that first appointed a receiver and the supreme court of that State that rendered this decision.

These are the reasons why that fraud order was issued against the People's United States Bank:

In soliciting subscriptions for the stock of the bank some of the inducements held out, which seem to have been effective, were that the board of directors would be composed of 7 strong men who had succeeded in building large fortunes of their own, that is, men independent in fortune; that the loaning of the bank's funds would be in the hands of 15 of the most experienced bankers; that the directors of the bank could not and would not loan the funds of the bank to themselves; that such funds were to be deposited in five large banks for the purpose of loaning, and that three directors of each of these banks were to be an advisory board, passing upon all loans; that the money subscribed to the capital stock must be either held in cash or invested only in Government bonds or such absolutely safe securities that they would pass the inspection of the Government or State bank examiners; that the bank's affairs were to be so closely watched by the Government and State officials that on the slightest sign of mismanagement or impairment of the bank's capital the examiner would at once step in and protect the stockholders and depositors; that he (Lewis) was arranging his personal affairs so as to take and pay for $1,000,000 of the stock himself, would be its president, and could not lend himself a single dollar of the bank's funds.

Here are some quotations from Lewis's publications which show their nature and the exceedingly hopeful, more than optimistic, disposition of the man, and show also why he thinks the express companies and others stand in his way. Among other things said, Lewis held forth as follows:

I pledge you all, here and now, that I will give my life and my heart's blood before one tiny speck of that confidence or one penny of that money shall ever be misplaced. * * * It is the king of banks, the dictator of the wealthy man's bank; for it is the people's bank, created by their small sums each, all directors, none of them borrowers, and its debtors will be the great banking institutions of wealthy men. I am straining every nerve to organize for you what I believe to be the greatest bank in the world. I am arranging my resources to put a million dollars into our bank myself and then trustee my stock so that its earnings will go into the reserve of the bank each year, and so that no wealthy scoundrel with the riches of Crœsus can ever gain control of our bank; for he must first collect from all over the Nation a million dollars of the stock in small sums to offset my single trusteed holdings. He could not do it. In your hands will always be the election of the officers and directors. Only by serving you truly and well can they hold their positions, and I tell you again that I would rather be president of that bank and the Woman's Magazine than President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is this a public proclamation?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; it reads like it, and you can see very readily what effect it would have on a certain class of people.

* * * Never before have the people of moderate means been permitted to get in on the ground floor of a great bank. This bank of ours, with its capital invested in Government bonds and high-class securities, and which never speculates with its money, but deals with other great banks and holds them responsible. * * * I am not only putting nearly a million dollars into it myself, but am so doing it as to add my share of its earnings to the reserve of the bank, thereby doubling the value of your stock from year to year. * * * Putting your money into this stock is a very different matter from putting it into some mine, or oil well, or industrial enterprise. You take no possible chance of loss under its plan of organization. I would advise my own mother to put the last penny she had in the world into it. * * * I tell you frankly your profits will burn your hands. * * * I have pledged my fortune and my great publishing company to you in it. * * * I will sacrifice the flesh on my body before the purpose of this great bank shall be moved one inch from the path laid out; and I ask you in turn for that confidence and love, as it is the sweetest wine that can ever pass a man's lips. * * * A bank which, never speculating, puts its capital in gilt securities, will forever stand as the tower of safety and strength to a million families whose savings and all it guards. * * * No man, no matter what his wealth, or any combination of men, can ever change the purpose for which this great bank has been organized, or ever divert its funds from the absolutely safe lines that have been laid down, without first obtaining the consent of nearly 70,000 different stockholders. * * * I will put a stumbling block in the path of the man whose greed for wealth shall ever tempt him to stock-job or bleed it that will break his neck before he can surmount it. I hope to see the day when an election to the board of this bank will be harder to gain and more sought after than an election to Congress.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, in commenting upon these promises of Lewis, said:

It needs not the test of a cold, judicial touchstone to determine that a good deal of the foregoing is, using the word in its primary meaning, afflatus rhodomontade. Thus: "Heart's blood;" "wealthy scoundrel;" "Crœsus;" "I would advise my own mother to put the last penny she had in the world into it;" profits that will burn one's hand; the promise to sacrifice the flesh of his body; the "sweetest wine that can pass a man's lips," to wit, love and confidence; "tower of safety;" "strength to a million families;" "stumbling block in the path of a man whose greed for wealth shall tempt him to stock-job or bleed" the bank would "break his neck;" a "hope to see the day when an election to the board of directors" would be "harder to gain and more sought after than an election to Congress." What is all this but a flourish of trumpets of advertising rhetoric of the type used in the exploitation of bitters, Peruna, and liver pills; the transparent use of bold hyperbole, of which rhetorical figure it is said that "it lies without deceiving?" All lucubrations of that ilk fail to reach either the form or substance of enforceable promises. Nevertheless, when the mass is put in a reducing crucible of common sense, and the dross of mere verblage is burnt and refined away, it stands forth, as said, that promises were made by him, and that, too, of a substantial sort. For instance, he promises, in effect, the bank should not be one man's bank; that it should have a directorate of trained, independent, wealthy financiers, who might bring to the loaning of its funds the shrewdness and thrift of experienced wisdom; that the directors should not borrow its funds; that they should be deposited in large banks and were to be kept in cash or invested in Government bonds or such absolutely safe securities; and that Lewis could not lend a dollar to himself. Now, how did the result correspond with the "sounding phrase of the manifesto"? How were these sensible and practical promises kept and performed by the corporation? Indifferently well, it must be admitted. For example, the bank was organized with a directorate composed of Lewis and nominal stockholders, Lewis's underlings at that, i. e., men subordinate to him in his other two ventures, mere vest-pocket corporations of his, with not a banker in the lot, and within a few months after its organization nearly a million dollars of its capital are found loaned to the said publishing company and said development company, thus doing in a circuit—as the fox runs—exactly what he had promised should not be done in a straight line—as a bee flies—to wit, loan the bank's funds to himself or its directors.

Among the false and fraudulent representations and promises which the Postmaster General found that Lewis had made in the promotion of his scheme were those relative to the amount of capital stock which Lewis had subscribed and would subscribe; representations relative to the independent, strong, capable men who would compose the board of directors; representations and promises that all funds of the bank would be loaned by a committee composed of a board of 15 directors of the principal banks of St. Louis; and that the funds would not be loaned to himself or other directors. The Postmaster General found that in his early articles in the Woman's Magazine and in his other advertising literature about the bank Lewis represented that he would subscribe to the capital stock a dollar for every dollar subscribed by others, so that he would own half of the capital stock, and that later he represented that he had pledged his entire fortune, every dollar he had and his publishing business, in this banking enterprise, and that his subscriptions would exceed a million dollars. These representations were found to be false and made with intent to deceive.

The evidence upon which the Postmaster General acted showed that Lewis had not cooperated to the extent of a single dollar of his own money, although the bank had then been in operation some seven months and had a paid-up capital stock of $2,000,000; that Lewis had received and held as payment for shares of stock in the bank the sum of $2,290,000 and had accounted to the bank for only $2,200,000. Thus every cent of the $2,000,000 paid-in capital stock was received from the public and Lewis had invested nothing, although he had stated that almost all of the $500,000 paid in at the original incorporation of the bank were his personal funds.

The seven independent, strong, capable men "practically retired from active business," "standing between the intrigue and influence of the cold-blooded banking business and the people's money," were represented by only five persons, consisting of Lewis and four of his underlings—one the editor of his magazine and the other three employees of his publishing company. These men complied with every request of Lewis for the loan of money, and hundreds of thousands of dollars were loaned to Lewis and his enterprises.

The committee composed of three directors each of the five principal banks of St. Louis, who would pass upon all loans that the board of directors might desire to make, was never organized, and although Lewis repeatedly and persistently represented that the funds of the bank could not be loaned to himself and other directors, the evidence upon which the Postmaster General issued the fraud order showed that loans had been made practically at Lewis's will; that the day after the post-office inspectors began their investigation Lewis placed in the assets of the bank two notes—one for $50,000, signed by himself, loaned without collateral, and the other for almost $150,000, signed by the board of directors. These notes were paid into the bank to cover money previously expended by him. When the paid-in capital stock of the bank amounted to $500,000, $400,000 of it Lewis had loaned to himself and his enterprises, and later, when the paid-in capital stock amounted to $2,000,000, Lewis's loans to himself and his enterprises amounted to over $900,000, and in addition he had invested almost $45,000 of the bank's money in stocks and bonds of his enterprises and had agreed to loan about $67,000 of the bank's money on an unsecured note.

Lewis's corporation, the University Heights Realty & Development Co., which had borrowed from the bank $346,000, and the stock of which to the extent of nearly 1,300 shares Lewis had sold to the bank, was found to have assets consisting for the most part of land purchased for $200,000, as a speculation in suburban property, upon which Lewis said about $150,000 had been expended in improvements, but the liabilities of this company were found to be nearly $675,000.

The record upon which the fraud order was issued also showed that until checked by the secretary of state of Missouri Lewis was obtaining proxies from all stockholders, appointing himself to vote the stock. These proxies were to remain in force for three years at least, and in case revocation was desired in that time Lewis was to have the opportunity to purchase the stock. Nearly 4,500 shares of the increased capital stock of the bank were issued, and in every instance the shareholder had signed a proxy to the above effect.

When demand was made by the secretary of state of Missouri for the immediate return to the bank of all funds borrowed by Lewis and his enterprises, Lewis, up to the time of the issuance of the fraud order, had failed to pay the loans. He continued, however, to receive a large number of remittances for stock in the bank in his own name, and sought remittances of money for deposits in the bank upon the same representations and from the same persons as in the sale of stock. It was stated that it was the intention of the bank to increase its stock to $5,000,000, and remittances were asked for on that account.

After the issuance of the fraud order action was taken by the authorities of Missouri to have a receiver appointed to take charge of the affairs of the bank and wind up its business, and on August 15, 1905, the circuit court of St. Louis County made an order placing the affairs of the bank in the hands of a receiver.

At the time of the issuance of the fraud order there was, as we have seen, something over $2,000,000 of stock outstanding, and something like $300,000 of deposits, making a total received by Lewis in the bank matter of about $2,400,000. Lewis had, however, appropriated between $900,000 and $1,000,000 of this money for himself and his various institutions, and had given to the bank notes therefor. This left on hand deposits in the various banks of St. Louis at the time the fraud order was issued about $1,400,000. After the depositors were paid there was something over $1,000,000 left for the stockholders.

LEWIS HAS BANK STOCK ASSIGNED TO HIM.

Immediately upon the issuance of the fraud order Mr. Lewis, through his publications, represented to his readers and to the stockholders in the bank that he had been grossly misused; that he and they were being persecuted; that the bank was being destroyed without having an opportunity to be heard in its defense and at the behest of the money powers of the country; that, however, no stockholder in the bank should ever lose one dollar of his investment, but that Lewis would assume all of the loss and make good every dollar to every stockholder who had invested in the bank. He urged that they assign their stock certificates to him, and promised that upon receipt thereof he would send them stock in his publishing company, dollar for dollar, or, at their option, would send them his trusteed notes for the face value of the stock, bearing 5 per cent interest, payable semiannually.

The trusteed notes were secured by a trust deed given upon his income over and above his living expenses. The capital stock of his publishing company, which he represented to be of great value and exceedingly profitable, was increased from $1.200,000 to $3,500,000, and this stock was sent to the stockholders of the bank in exchange for their stock in the bank. Through these representations he procured the assignment to him of $1,200,000 of the stock in the bank for stock in the Lewis Publishing Co., and $500,000 of stock in the bank for his trusteed notes, making a total of $1,700,000 of stock in the bank thus secured. The receiver appointed for the bank in the State courts, after having paid the depositors, had in hand something over $1,000,000 which belonged to the stockholders, and announced his readiness to pay a dividend of 50 cents on the dollar. Lewis thereupon presented to the receiver the stock which had been assigned to him and received upon it 50 cents on the dollar, partly in notes of himself and his institutions and partly in cash. The receiver then announced his readiness to pay a further dividend of 35 cents on the dollar, whereupon Lewis presented to him stock in the bank which had been assigned to him and received upon the same the balance of the notes of himself and his institutions which he had given the bank, and the remainder in cash, so that in this manner Lewis secured the payment of his notes of something over $900,000 and something like $500,000 in cash. A further dividend of 2 per cent was finally paid by the receiver, making a total dividend declared of 87 per cent; but only those stockholders who refused to transfer their stock to Lewis and who were only a small minority actually received 87 cents on the dollar. Lewis received the balance and the holders of the $1,700,000 worth of stock which was assigned to him received his notes and stock in his publishing company. The first six months' interest on the notes was paid and it seems one small dividend paid on the stock of the publishing company. The notes are now long past due, and only in a few rare instances have they been paid. Practically nothing has been paid upon these notes and practically nothing has been paid upon the stock of the Lewis Publishing Co., which was issued to the stockholders of the bank, so that in truth the owners of $1,700,000 of this stock have received practically nothing for their stock.

WHY LEWIS WAS SUCCESSFUL IN OBTAINING THE BANK STOCK.

To secure the exchange of bank stock for his publishing company stock Lewis represented that the publishing company paid regular annual dividends of 6 per cent; that it was making a profit of a quarter of a million dollars a year; that it would own the Daily Star of St. Louis; that it had paid for the equipment, presses, machinery, and great publishing buildings in cash weekly as the plant and building were constructed; that the company owned real estate; that it had no debts except current expenses; that it was the largest and most profitable publishing business in the world; and, again, that the stock would pay 100 per cent dividends and have a cash asset of $3,000,000. Lewis also represented that, besides the income from this profitable publishing business, he had a large private fortune in real estate and other property, and that he personally pledged his fortune and income to pay back every dollar in full. Lewis made earnest personal appeals for the exchange, alleging that it was necessary in order to give him the means of protecting their interests from a conspiracy of their enemies. In other words, after having violated the State banking laws in loaning himself and his enterprises more than the law allowed him as an officer of the bank, and more than a bank is allowed to loan one customer, and having broken his promises that no officer of the bank could borrow its funds, and after having abused the trust of these stockholders, he appealed to them as their protector against both State and Federal Governments, which were protecting their interests.

The trustee notes have become due, and neither interest nor principal has been paid. The promises to exchange them and the publishing company stock for stock in the new bank have been repudiated, and the pledges to redeem the notes in cash have not been kept. It was not true that the company paid regular dividends, nor that it had paid for the plant and buildings in cash out of earnings, nor that he had on hand a million dollars in cash, nor that it had no indebtedness. The real estate was mortgaged; the presses were mortgaged; and on March 14, 1905, Lewis issued a statement showing liabilities of nearly $600,000.

THE UNITED STATES FIBER STOPPER CO.

In 1906 Lewis, through his publishing company, started a daily paper, known as the Woman's National Daily. Up to about a year ago Lewis, through the publishing company, issued, in addition to the Woman's National Daily, the Journal of Agriculture, the Woman's Farm Journal, the Woman's Magazine, Palette and Bench, and Beautiful Homes. Palette and Bench was sold, and all the other papers discontinued or merged into the Woman's National Daily, and the frequency of issue of this paper has been changed to weekly.

Since the bank affair the columns of the daily have been used to exploit Lewis's various schemes. One of these, known as the United States Fiber Stopper Co., claims a capital stock of $1,000,000 and to be organized to manufacture, under certain patents, bottle stoppers of paper or fiber. Some time ago Lewis represented that he had sold the English rights under these patents for $500,000, and that he was therefore ready to manufacture stoppers in this country; that he had thousands of dollars' worth of orders to be filled; and that the profits of the company would be enough to pay big dividends on the stock. He also represented that the stock was then worth a premium of 100 per cent. The rights were never sold in England for $500,000, the company never manufactured corks for the market, never paid any dividends, never had any tangible assets, and the stock was never worth double the face value—in fact, it never had any real value.

THE READERS' POOL.

Another scheme exploited in the Woman's National Daily was the so-called "readers' pool." It was started in the early part of 1908. Lewis proposed that every person who sent him $5 in subscriptions to his paper would, for as many remittances of that amount as were sent, receive a certificate of membership in the pool. From each remittance $2 was to be set aside and placed in a fund and when the fund grew large enough land was to be purchased for the members of the fund. As months rolled by he reported great success, and finally decided to close the pool on April 12, and leading up to that time urged that enough be sent to buy a 50-acre lot, which would cost $75,000. On April 15 he declared that remittances for the 12th had been so large that he was not able to count them, but he surely had enough to buy the 50 acres, and had already done so. He promised to put the land on the market the same year and divide the proceeds semiannually among the members until the last foot was sold. However, ignoring this promise, he stated a little later that he had purchased for the pool another lot, free and clear of all incumbrances, of 48¼ acres, at $2,225 an acre, but alleged it was worth $5,000 an acre. He stated he had paid for this land $108,000, and asked that remittances be continued until he had $42,000 to improve it and $50,000 for a building loan fund. In May, 1909, Lewis stated that the scheme was meeting with great success and he had received $20,000 in 10 days, and that the 48¼ acres had been bought for $125,000. The pool was to be divided into 100,000 portions and the profits to the members were to run into millions. Neither he nor any member of the company could share in the pool. It all belonged to the members who sent him $5. It was to be a square deal, and for the first time in the history of the world the common people were to share in the unearned increment of city property.

The profits were to be millions and the subscriptions were to be worth a million to him and his publications. When he solicited remittances, Lewis promised to give account of the pool. Although requested, no accounting has been made. There is no information to show that the money was kept in a special account. Members have no definite information that the promised number of acres were purchased and no information that sales of lots were made or attempted as promised. There is no definite knowledge of the number of certificates issued. If his scheme-fertile brain would pause long enough in its mad whirl to entertain a memory of the "Readers' Pool," Lewis, I think, would cry out in the words of Macbeth:

Thou art too like the spirit of Banquo; down!

THE AMERICAN WOMAN'S LEAGUE.

In 1908 Lewis organized the American Woman's League as an auxiliary of his publishing company. In his first literature he proposed the scheme as a means of paying his debts. Membership in this league was to be secured by sending $52 worth of subscriptions to Lewis's papers or for certificates of membership. It could be secured in no other way. One-half of these remittances were to go to pay for subscriptions, the other half to be put into a fund and the income of it used for the benefit of the league membership, which was to be limited to 1,000,000 persons. This was to give the league an endowment of $26,000,000; but the league was also to own the publishing company, the real estate at University City, and a bank, which would become enormously rich through handling the business and funds of the publishing company, real estate, and the league. From these sources the income of the league was figured to be $3,800,000 annually. The $26,000,000 endowment would remain undisturbed. From the income alone clubhouses were to be built, furnished, and supported in all parts of the country; a free university, with courses from the lowest grades to and including instruction in every branch of study and culture and the professions, was to be established; an old ladies' home, a library, an orphanage, a woman's exchange, a loan and relief fund, and numerous other benefits, all to be free to the members of the league. Later he changed this, and as a little stimulant to quicken the feminine pulse launched the Founders' Chapter. This was to be composed of the first 100,000 members who sent in $52 each. Men might be admitted at $20 per. Lewis promised to endow this chapter with $1,000,000 of the capital stock of the Lewis Publishing Co. (characteristically forgetting that he had previously pledged the entire stock of this company to the league as a whole). This endowment would pay 100 per cent, or $1,000,000, the first year and several times that modest sum every year afterwards. He was also to endow the chapter with a million dollars of the capital stock of the trust company, which Mr. Lewis was to buy for cash (where he would get it is not stated) and donate to the league. The income from this was to equal the income from the publishing company. The 100,000 members were to share in this income for life. It was to amount to $15 or $20 yearly and to be paid semiannually. Later he changed the plans again and allowed subscriptions to other papers to count for membership, limited to only such papers as allowed him a 50 per cent commission on orders.

Last summer the league was said to have about 100,000 members, of whom 26,000 appeared to be life members. If the 26,000 life members paid $52 each for membership, there should have been at that time a fund of $1,352,000. This fund, however, should have amounted to considerably more than that when to it are added sums varying from $1 to $51 paid by the remaining 74,000 persons. Last fall, yielding to persistent demands for an accounting, Lewis stated through his employees that he had received from the league $892,576; that he had spent $1,117,782. He gave no credit for interest, and instead of millions of endowments the statement shows a shortage of $342,064. At the same time he announced that the average cost of maintaining a membership was $20, and that correspondence cost the league 20 cents a letter. He said that 60,000 members would each be entitled to a $20 debenture. This would amount to $1,200,000, or $307,424 more than the total contributions to the league.

Lewis originally insisted that the whole success of the scheme depended upon the fact that membership could be secured only by sending $52 worth of subscriptions to his papers. The benefits were to come from the increased circulation of the papers and the renewal of subscriptions from year to year. Now, he allows membership to be bought for cash or for subscriptions to papers other than his own. He admits that 70 per cent of these subscriptions are given away and that recipients of the publications do not renew; that his monthly papers, constituting at one time, according to his statement, the greatest and most profitable business in the world, have been discontinued, because he found that they were published at a loss. It took him three years to find this out.

Lewis's statements show that the league is not paying its own expenses; that, instead of being run on the income from paid endowment, it has, through Lewis's exclusive management, used up its entire capital and is $800,000 in debt. Add to this the $1,200,000 of debentures to be paid later, and we have a debt of $2,000,000 against the league.

Lewis says the average cost of membership in the league is $20 a year; that the life member brings the league only $26, so that after two years a member of this kind has already cost $14 more than she contributed. Each year, so long as she lives, $20 is added to the deficit.

The great educational university consists, for the most part, at least, of correspondence lessons. Lewis arranged for these lessons by contracts with three existing concerns, and without consent of the instructors associated with these schools catalogued their names. Many of them have never heard of either Lewis or his university.

The American Woman's League is one of the largest and most alluring and most fraudulent of the schemes of E. G. Lewis. In the extravagance of his promises he has attracted women of many classes and temperaments. Culture and educational advantages appeal to their ambition, a clubhouse appeals to their social instincts and civic pride, an orphanage for children and a home for the aged to their charity, and an independent income and freedom from domestic drudgery and masculine domination to a discontented and unfortunate class. Lewis knows well how to excite the pride, vanity, desire for notoriety, and the sentiments and passions of his readers. But the full force of the nefarious scheme comes to us only when we realize that all of his clever writings, his disgusting flattery, his educational allurements, and association with respectability are focused in the purpose of winning the confidence of country people that he might borrow their money on worthless paper securities. On his own statements the funds belonging to the league and intrusted to him on his promises to give an account of them have been misappropriated. No endowment has been made; Lewis has disposed of everything. The league is $800,000 in debt on his accounting, and members hold $1,200,000 in notes besides. Not a single essential promise has been kept. There is no endowment of the league, nor Founders' Chapter, nor annuity, nor orphanage, nor old ladies' home; the league does not own the land promised it, nor the publishing company, nor the bank; membership may be purchased for cash; clubhouses are not built as promised; instead of $3,800,000 annual income, it is in debt more than $2,000,000.

The American Woman's League was a fraudulent scheme on its face. Its record has confirmed its text. It was a mere name given to the women whom Lewis had inveigled into his service as subscription agents. He hoped through the league to defeat the postal laws and regulations under which he had previously been prevented from circulating his papers free at the pound rate of postage. By promising the women rewards and profits far in excess of the cost of subscriptions he induced them to remit in bulk for coupons for subscriptions, which they might sell or give away. The remittances would constitute a reward to satisfy the postal inspectors. The correspondence courses and clubhouses and association of other publishers would inspire confidence, and when this was established a borrowing scheme could be inaugurated to collect millions. This developed the debenture scheme.

THE DEBENTURE SCHEME.

Lewis defaulted on the interest of the three-year trustee notes given in 1905 in exchange for stock in the People's United States Bank. He also defaulted on the principal of the notes when due. The Lewis Publishing Co. stock did not pay the promised dividends, and notes of the Development & Investment Co. were not paid when due. Default was made on the Lewis Publishing Co.'s 7 per cent notes. Suits were being docketed for notes and other obligations. Demands were being made for clubhouses and other benefits promised to women of the league. Salaries due women for working up membership were due and demands being made for them.

The expenses of a large number of women at a "hurrah-for-Lewis" meeting at St. Louis last June must be met at once. Remittances from the league account had almost ceased. Demands from many quarters were incessant from all these different obligations last summer. It would seem that the limit had been reached and the time for an accounting had come. Any other man would either have absconded or sought relief in a bankruptcy court. Not so with Lewis. He had been in such situations before. He thought, and, from that prison-like idea in cement at University City, borrowed from the land of the Pharaohs, "The Woman's National Daily," heralded "the solution." Lewis contended that, so far, every scheme was a fortune. Although he vainly boasted of $8,000,000 assets, with liabilities of only one-third of that amount, he admitted that he was unable to finance his enterprises and proposed that everything he had in the world be trusteed under a builders' fund, and that debentures be issued against this fund to pay off his debts. He said that a paltry $2,500,000 would do it. It is incredible that anyone outside the confines of an insane asylum would have loaned money on such a scheme, and yet Lewis so successfully confused the situation, made such plausible and extravagant promises of future profits, coupled with his pretense of a great sacrifice in giving up a private fortune (which many would have liked to find) that women actually subscribed to the debentures to the amount of about $1,500,000.

Mr. Lewis takes a full page of his paper to explain the new financial tangle, yet all could have been told in these few words: "I have mortgages and interest and notes and other obligations coming due. Creditors are pressing me for their money. I have borrowed the limit on such property as I have. Bankers and money lenders will loan me no more. The Woman's League scheme has failed to furnish sufficient cash to meet my obligations. Hence I propose to create a man of straw. I will dump all of my debts over on his imaginary shoulders, and have him issue all the 10-year notes needed. I will hand these notes over to my country creditors for everything that I owe them. That will keep them quiet for 10 years, anyway. Then I will issue more of the straw-man notes—there is no limit to them—and exchange them with country people for what further cash I need. These creditors owe me a living for these 10 years, and if there is anything left them they are welcome to it, provided I can not think up a bigger scheme or two to fool them with in the meantime."

What a saving there would have been in paper and printer's ink! How much confusion, how many consequent headaches he would have spared his readers! But then, would Mr. Lewis's genius for complications and literary mazes have been served? Would the real purpose of his scheme have been disguised?

Let us examine Lewis's claim of $8,000,000 assets and the intimation that $2,500,000 of debentures would liquidate his obligations. In August last the assessment on real estate held by him and the companies controlled by him amounted to approximately $1,779,220. Some experts claim that the assessments are on a basis of three-fifths of the actual value, others estimate at one-half:

Using the most favorable estimate, the value would be	$3,598,440
Against this he had at the same time mortgages recorded against the property to the amount of	2,926,108
Leaving, according to the most liberal estimate, an equity of only	672,332

Now, let us see how many debentures will cover his obligations. It will take $3,000,000 for the mortgages and $1,500,000 for the notes and stock he traded for the old company; $850,000 for the obligations of the Lewis Publishing Co., exclusive of real estate mortgages; $2,000,000 for 100,000 league members in lieu of the promised annuity; $557,500, as stated September 8, 1910, in lieu of dividends. He owes in definite figures over $8,000,000, and, besides this, debentures were issued in exchange of stock on the Lewis company; for interest due on mortgages and notes; for subscription certificates; for readers' pool certificates; and for commissions for agency work to an indefinite amount. Taking his own grossly inflated estimate of assets, the liabilities would exceed them half a million dollars, and may run to an indefinite amount. The debentures are payable in 10 years, and for the first two or three years draw a nominal rate of interest, so that under the present plan Mr. Lewis could continue to devote the proceeds of these debentures to his running expenses and ever-recurring interest charges and to the actual expense of marketing the debentures themselves for a number of years. He could even pay the interest on the debentures themselves for the first two or three years out of the proceeds of other debentures, making a sort of endless chain of the proceeding; and, judging from his past operations, this is what he will do if permitted to use postal facilities for the continuation of this and the other fraudulent schemes which originate in his fertile mind under the pressure of financial difficulties. The extravagance of this debenture scheme is in itself indisputable evidence of fraud. It is promoted with a purpose of giving only to an all too confiding and gullible people an impression of fairness. What sane man would be so prodigal of paper obligations he ever expected to redeem?

THE LEWIS RECIPE FOR UNLOADING PERSONAL OBLIGATIONS.

Issuing debentures and exchanging them for the trustee notes was not the only way Lewis devised to get rid of these notes, which, overdue, were becoming troublesome. Besides the notes and the stock Lewis had sold mortgages, bonds, and notes of great variety and in unlimited numbers. These he called in, and promised to pay for them in cash or exchange them for stock in the People's Savings Trust Co., which he later organized. Those who sent in their certificates and asked for cash got in return an "interim receipt." This receipt is the Lewis recipe for unloading personal obligations. The joker is that the "interim" is not limited. It may extend a thousand years. The property received is, according to the receipt, to be held in trust and transferred in accordance with the order of the board of directors of the Savings Trust Co., in pursuance of the plans for final organization thereof. From this and what has been said it will thus be seen that the prominent feature of the Lewis method for obtaining other people's money and quell the squeal is to create a number of companies or concerns, sell the stock on the strength of his plausible misstatements, and when the time came for the payment of dividends, the interest, or the principal of the money loaned, to change or convert the stock, notes, and so forth, into other paper, in order to obtain more time. Thus there has been organizing and mixing and combining of his concerns, followed by the issuance, exchange, and reissuance of shares of stock, notes, debentures, receipts, and so forth, and the columns of his papers have been used to "boost" these "enterprises."

Although I have already taken up much time with these Lewis schemes, I have not by any means touched upon them all. A statement with any attempt at completeness of his operations for the last few years would fill a volume of no mean proportions.

As his account with the hundred-odd publishers growing out of their fulfillment of subscriptions through the American Woman's League had to be settled, Lewis ingeniously inaugurated a new way of settling such matters outside of the bankruptcy court. By a so-called agreement with the publishers he attempts to consolidate his various interests and place them in the hands of a board of trustees. Thus, as Lewis seems to stagger upon the brink of financial ruin, it is amusing to read his statements in the Woman's National Weekly that, by reason of this agreement, for the first time in many years the sunshine has broken through the darkening and forbidding clouds and a great burden has been lifted from his shoulders.

There is another side, however, to this case which should be borne in mind: During the last 10 years E. G. Lewis has taken from the American people not less than $10,000,000. This money has come mostly from women who could ill afford to lose it—servant girls, washerwomen, boarding-house keepers—often the savings of a lifetime.

It is an old saying that "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." When the women of this country fully awake from the hypnotic trance of this man and see the facts as they are, will Lewis, like King Richard III, command:

> A flourish, trumpets! Strike alarum, drums!
> Let not the heavens hear these tell-tale women
> Rail on the Lord's anointed. Strike, I say,
> Either be patient, and entreat me fair,
> Or with the clamorous report of war
> Thus will I drown your exclamations.

IS THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT TO BLAME FOR THE FAILURE OF THE SCHEMES?

In the issue of the Woman's National Daily for February 20, 1911, is an article entitled "The United States Government's shame," occupying half of the entire contents of that issue, four pages. It purports to come from the pen of former Third Assistant Postmaster General E. C. Madden, and to give "The secret history of the assassination of the People's United States Bank and the Lewis Publishing Co." It lays the blame at the door of the Post Office Department for the failure of the Lewis schemes. Let us review these schemes with this charge in mind.

Upon the record of the case of the People's United States Bank I submit that the Postmaster General was justified in issuing the fraud order in 1905. But for it many more thousand people in this country would now be without their savings. That bank scheme was a rich haul for Lewis. He never put a dollar into the venture, and yet he diverted to himself and his other enterprises nearly a million dollars of the bank's cash, and when its affairs were settled he drew an additional $500,000 on the stock that had been transferred to him.

A question concerning that quiet, gentle scheme, the United States Fiber Stopper Co., What effect has the Post Office Department had upon its operation? And yet the number of thousands of dollars Lewis has scooped in on this "paper" company he only knows.

I would like to ask the same question about that mysterious "readers' pool," and must confess that I regret that the Post Office Department has not thrown its searchlight into its abysmal depths, that we may know how many thousands of dollars of the people's money have been thrown into it, and in just what way the money has leaked out. In this, however, I only share the fond wish of many, that these questions be answered by that "postal martyr," E. G. Lewis.

Then we come to the American Woman's League, with its promised endowment of $26,000,000 and its income of $3,800,000 rolling in as regularly and as often as "the bells ring out the old and ring in the new year." Let us contemplate that mirage of an American woman's republic, with its capital in the great and flourishing University City, and its beautiful and sumptuous chapter houses scattered throughout the length and breadth of this country; its great university; its orphanage; its home for the aged; its library; and the thousand-odd institutions upon which the great woman's republic was to be built. Has the rude hand of the Post Office Department interrupted this dream? It began in 1908, three long years after the bank affair, and in a time when the department and Lewis were perfectly amicable. It has had all the benefits of "peaceful times," and yet if we break the spell of its allurements by turning our eyes from its entrancing prospectuses we see set against the "assured" endowment of $26,000,000 and the independent annual income of $3,800,000 no capital, no funds, but $2,000,000 in debts.

Is it charged that the involuntary bankruptcy proceedings against Lewis which began recently in St. Louis were brought about by this ruling of the Post Office Department we now have under consideration? If so, I would like some one to explain to me why Lewis could not have used a little of the $10,000,000 that a more generous than wise people have given him in recent years and have paid the paltry thousand dollars a week in lawful postage on copies of the paper sent to those persons who, unconsulted and lacking interest in his schemes, threw them in the waste basket? Lewis claims that he has been paid for each and every copy of the Woman's National Weekly circulated. Where, then, is the loss to him?

Then, too, why were so many publishers interested in a recent agreement under which Lewis endeavored to consolidate his all and turn it over to them in trust for their benefit? Some one said they lent him $500,000 in subscriptions and that he has never paid anything on account of the bills for those subscriptions to their publications which they fulfilled for the American Woman's League. How much did these publishers' claims contribute toward the bringing of the bankruptcy proceedings? And then, too, what did his other creditors have to do with the suit?

After a broad view is taken of the operations of the Lewis "companies"—I like the word "schemes" better—during the last 10 years, particularly of those to which I have referred, does the conclusion not follow that these "enterprises" have been merely Lewis's devices for extracting other people's money as quietly as possible?

THE VIEWS OF OTHERS.

The following quotations from some of many letters received at the Post Office Department speak for themselves:

EAGLE GROVE, IOWA, March 23, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My wife and I noticed in the Woman's National Daily, edited by E. G. Lewis, an advertisement of the Realty & Development Co. They wanted to borrow money to improve their real estate and offered their notes at 6 per cent, with real estate security. We sent them $200 and got note in June, 1909. Last summer, at the request of the Realty & Development Co., we sent them our pass book to have the interest credited, and it has never come back, though we have written about it several times. This pass book contains the only evidence we had of another claim against them.

In May, 1910, we sent the Realty & Development Co. $600 more. Soon after they asked us to change our notes for debenture bonds which were to have 2 per cent the first year and increase at the rate of 1 per cent per annum until it reached 6 per cent. We exchanged the $600 and sent the notes to the trust company. Finally the bonds came, one for $500 and one for $100, but the conditions were changed. The circular described them as five-year bonds, with all the net earnings of all the companies to be divided during the five years. The bonds proved to be 10-year bonds, and the earnings were not to be divided until the end of the 10 years. We sent them back and demanded our notes. In about a week the $100 bond came back, with no explanation. We promptly wrote, refusing the bonds and demanding our notes. To this we have received no answer. The notes and the $500 bond the trust company still have, and all we have to show for our $800 and nearly two years' correspondence and worry is a bond for $100 and a note for $200, on which we can get no interest.

Yours, respectfully,

FRED. E. YORK.

WINFIELD, N. Y., March 25, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I urge that the affairs of E. G. Lewis, the St. Louis publisher, be made the subject of a searching investigation. He organized the "People's United States Bank." On his representations, a relative and I invested $500 in the stock of the bank. Something went wrong and a receiver was appointed. Lewis persuaded us to transfer our stock to him, we receiving in its place stock of the Lewis Publishing Co. Lewis repeatedly promised during the summer and fall of 1910 that he would pay off all of his debts and take up the stock of those dissatisfied with their investment. Much space was used in his paper explaining his plans and urging his readers to subscribe to the debenture notes. On a number of occasions he claimed to have taken in over $1,000,000 from this source.

I took Lewis at his word and wrote him that I wished to cash my certificate of stock in accordance with his promise to the public. His reply was that the stock of the publishing company could not be retired at the request of the stockholders.

His Woman's League is a scheme to defraud. The Woman's National Daily is printed to exploit Lewis's schemes for extorting money from the public. These women are misled and really believe Lewis to be a paragon of virtue and integrity. I understand that Lewis is not worth a dollar outside of what he collects from the confiding women who are at present financing his schemes.

I urge that action be taken at once in order to protect the public from this designing promoter of schemes to defraud, and insure a return to investors of at least a few dollars of the many Lewis has filched from his dupes.

Yours, respectfully, JOHN F. ROBERTS.

SOMERS, N. Y., March 31, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK.

SIR: I infer from letters that an investigation into the affairs of the multinamed company of St. Louis, whose head is E. G. Lewis, is in prospect. Knowing the power that he has had over helpless and poorly informed women to secure from them funds they so sorely need, I beg to add my entreaties to those of thousands of others, that the search may be immediate and thorough. I regard the whole scheme as without parallel, and not even Dowie has held such peculiar mesmeric influence as this man has had over his victims.

I shall hope to know that your best work is being done to release these victims.

Very truly, yours, AMY J. BROWN.

STRATFORD, CONN., March 31, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Is there no way that E. G. Lewis, of St. Louis, Mo., can be prevented from using the United States mails for the purpose of defrauding the people of the country out of their money? It is my honest and candid opinion that is his sole purpose of publishing his Woman's National Daily and other publications. I am a victim.

With great respect,

P. BURGER MACKEY.

BEREA, OHIO, April 13, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: About eight years ago, when Lewis was organizing the People's Bank, of St. Louis, I bought $125 worth of stock in the bank, putting in every dollar I possessed at the time. When the bank was closed * * * I took a note at 5 per cent interest for the amount, which I was asked to indorse and return about two years ago, as Mr. Lewis was ready to pay up these notes at that time. I did as requested, expecting to receive the money right away. Instead I received an interim receipt for the note. I have not been paid any interest for more than five years.

I have asked Mr. Lewis many times for the money, but all I could get was a promise to pay sometime soon. He has been trying to induce me to send him more money, even as late as January, 1911, for some new scheme which he is trying to work on the people.

I respectfully ask an investigation and hope I may receive payment, as I am greatly in need of the money.

Very respectfully, Mrs. T. M. BERWICK.

GREENVILLE, MICH., April 18, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

If not too presuming, and with your permission, I would like to ask how much longer is that promoter of fake schemes, E. G. Lewis, of St. Louis, Mo., going to be permitted to rob unsophisticated and innocent people of their hard-earned savings by using the United States mails for the promotion of his fraudulent schemes? Is he going on for a lifetime unpunished?

I have a sister living with me who, dazzled by his People's United States Bank scheme of some years ago, sent out of her small earnings the sum of $50 for bank stock. When the so-called bank was closed she received a letter from E. G. Lewis frantically imploring her to immediately exchange her bank-stock certificate for one in his publishing company. She did so. Of course, like all the rest of his victims, she can not get anything from him. She is aged and in poor circumstances. We have both been ill almost unto death. That $50, little though it may seem to you, would be a help in our present time of need. If you can not help us, I appeal to you to try to stop the wholesale robbery of the poor practiced by E. G. Lewis and others of his class.

Very respectfully,

Miss C. A. MACOMBER.

DEXTER, ME., April 25, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing in regard to E. G. Lewis and the Lewis Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

Six years ago I sent him $50 under illusive promises to pay for stock in the now defunct People's United States Bank, since which time I have not been able to get any satisfaction or any direct word from him whatever. I heartily approve of your efforts to do your duty toward Lewis and his ilk.

Very truly, yours, CHARLES C. HALE.

WEST SPRINGFIELD, MASS., April 28, 1911.

As a victim of Mr. E. G. Lewis, of St. Louis, Mo., I wish to protest against any further privilege being granted him to secure money from unsuspecting people through his paper or by any other means within the power of the proper authorities to prevent.

I placed $1,000 in his hands six years ago * * * and so far I have been unable to get anything in return from him, although he has made promises without limit.

My experience, like that of several I know, is that he is the greatest of modern frauds. I have abundant evidence.

With sincere respect, I am, GEORGE W. LOVE, Pastor First Congregational Church.

WHEELING, W. VA.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The actions of the Government in the matter of E. G. Lewis, of St. Louis, Mo., are in every way to be commended. The Woman's National Weekly has deteriorated until it is a worthless sheet, run solely as a vehicle wherein Mr. Lewis may exploit his various schemes.

I have been a member of the American Woman's League for more than two years, and was sent to the convention of the league at St. Louis last June. There I became convinced that the plan is essentially fraudulent. I have tabulated references to the Dailies, and they show that the paper is run solely for the purpose of advertising his many ingenious devices for obtaining other people's money.

Take the readers' pool. It was formed in 1908, and it was to yield immediate returns, divided semiannually. No statement of the readers' pool has ever been issued, though I have several times asked for one.

We were told that the league would be heavily and permanently endowed. In Daily of November 19 there is an informal financial statement, in which it was said the league was $350,000 in debt.

I ask for the fullest and most exhaustive audit and investigation of every scheme in which Mr. E. G. Lewis figures.

Through the agency of the Daily (now Weekly) stock was advertised for sale in the People's Savings Trust Co. I have a friend who long ago paid for several shares, but though the stock certificates have been promised many times they have never been issued. A dividend of 5 per cent was declared in January, but has never been paid.

All last fall Fiber Stopper Co. stock was given as premiums for Daily subscriptions.

Lewis is most daring and unprincipled, but I continue to have faith in the ability, probity, and power of the high officials of our Government. The Weekly is unworthy to be ranked with any newspapers.

Last summer we were urged to subscribe for all the Lewis publications. Then, on October 15, all the Lewis publications were discontinued except the Daily. You were told that you could transfer all unexpired subscriptions to the Daily or have the cash refunded. I calculated the amounts still due on my old orders and sent them a bill, telling them I preferred the cash. I wrote about it several times, but it was never sent.

Very respectfully, N. M. TENER.

MILAN, BRADFORD COUNTY, PA., April 10, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish you would look into the many schemes E. G. Lewis, of St. Louis, Mo., has gotten up to get money and see what they have amounted to.

My aunt has lost some money by him. All he will do is to make promises. I think he ought to be deprived of the mails, as he is nothing more than a faker of the smoothest kind.

Yours, very truly, L. A. HARRIS.

WOODFORD, N. Y., April 3, 1911.

Mr. FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, request that you use your influence to bar the publications of E. G. Lewis, of St. Louis, Mo., as they are, in our opinion, only advertisements of his swindling schemes and have taken hundreds of dollars from poor people in this vicinity.

M. B. WHITE,
M. C. ELMORE,
ERNEST WHITE,
FRANK JONES.

COLUSA, CAL., April 8, 1911.

Hon. JAMES J. BRITT,
Third Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: My wife is receiving, unpaid for by her, a copy of the National Woman's Weekly, of St. Louis, Mo. We do not want the paper at all, because we consider it a fraud of the first water. There are many more in this neighborhood who likewise receive the paper and have never subscribed for it.

Yours, truly, ERNEST WEYAND.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., April 21, 1911.

POSTMASTER GENERAL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Is there no way by which citizens may be relieved of the receipt of the sheet (Woman's National Weekly) inclosed herewith? I have never subscribed for it, do not want it, will not have it in my house, and have written the publishers repeatedly to stop sending it, without success. Please advise if there is any way by which this may be stopped.

Respectfully, yours, A. D. PECK.

JAMESPORT, N. Y., May 8, 1911.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you to let you know I approve of your efforts to stop E. G. Lewis and his concerns of St. Louis, Mo., the use of the United States mail to defraud the common people. He has $500 of my coin. I am a good loser, but don't think he should be allowed to continue this slippery work.

Respectfully, E. M. FREDERICK.

REMOVING A LITTLE OF THE LEWIS GLAMOUR.

I really think it is justified, in view of the nature of such an attack upon the Post Office Department, to remove a little of the glamour, to singe the sacred wings of this man, when there is such abundant opportunity for so doing. I do this with no ill will whatever, but I do think it ought to be understood that a wanton attack—I do not charge the Senator from Arkansas with doing it so much as those behind him—could not be made on men who are seeking to do their duty without revealing the true character of those who are making the attack. That is not merely a matter of retribution; in no sense is it a matter of vindictiveness; it is merely justice and fairness.

It is true these glowing descriptions have influenced a great many. As one plan would fail another would bob up in its place. In a recent issue of one of the foremost agricultural papers of the country appears the following in regard to E. G. Lewis:

TO SENATOR JEFF DAVIS:

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 10 you are reported as appearing on the Senate floor as the champion of E. G. Lewis and as a defender of his publications. You express your admiration of him as a business man and your approval of his papers as a service to womanhood. We discard the suggestion that this was merely a bid for cheap notoriety on your part. We are not prepared to believe that you spoke with a knowledge of the facts. We are inclined to believe that you hastily accepted the protests of Mr. Lewis and his friends as made in good faith, and that relying on this exclusive information you believed that Mr. Lewis was conducting an honest publishing business and that he was the publisher of legitimate and worthy publications. It would have been wiser to have informed yourself more fully before delivering yourself of such an unsparing indorsement of the Lewis schemes; but we have no disposition to criticize an honest error.

We, however, take the liberty to give you some voluntary information. Here it is: For the last 10 years Mr. Lewis has been working confidence schemes on country people. The principal function of his papers has been to sell "gold bricks" to his readers. It is estimated that he got from these people in all about $10,000,000. Much of it he promised to return at definite fixed times with great profits. He has refused to return it at all. The profits they never got. He got the money from children, from widows, from orphans, from working girls, from washerwomen, from cripples, from the aged and infirm, from old soldiers and superannuated ministers of the gospel, and from people whom he induced to mortgage their homes and their farms to share the wonderful profits he promised them. Some of these deluded victims have since died, piteously appealing to Mr. Lewis to return the money to provide the necessities for their last hours. Others are appealing to him yet in a blind faith in humanity, that no one could be so dishonest and cruel as to keep it. Some of them are completely dependent. He is as indifferent to the appeals of widows on behalf of sick and fatherless children as he is to the dying appeals of husband and father in behalf of those dependent on him.

Don't be misled by his lying pretense that this all happened because the Government interfered with his bank and his publications. Most of these complaints come from people who sent him the money on new schemes since the Government interfered. The department could not fully rescue his early dupes, but it did give them an opportunity to recover part of their loss and furnish an intimation for the protection of others. You interfere with the business of the safe breaker and the pickpocket when you apply the law to their trade. The Government simply applied the law established for the protection of its subjects to the Lewis enterprises.

The details of his schemes to get money from country people would take volumes to relate. The schemes were laid with a forethought and cunning worthy of a better cause. The amount each dupe could contribute was limited. It would not do to take enough from anyone so that he could afford to appeal to the United States courts. The victims must be widely distributed. It would not do to get too many dissatisfied victims together. Numerous companies must be formed. If you became dissatisfied with one paper certificate, you could have another—an old fake trick. He added $5,300,000 to a company already grossly overcapitalized, and by hysterical appeals and gross misrepresentations induced his dupes to buy over a million of it. After three years without profit he declared a dividend of 18 per cent, which had not been earned, promising to pay it in installments, and actually paid 2½ per cent. Then he offered the stock at par and sold more of it. The balance of the dividend never was paid, but we can tell you where stock was bought and paid for on the strength of that promised dividend. Perhaps you think it was not declared for that purpose. When selling this stock he promised that a pool of rich men had been formed to redeem the stock when the purchaser met a necessity for selling. Do you think the lie helped sell stock? He capitalized a few stopper patents for another million, and we can direct you to boys whom he induced to buy it at double its face value. Neither of these stocks was ever worth the paper the handsome certificates were written on. They are not worth so much now. He advertised notes secured by a first mortgage on real estate, and when he got the remittance he sent an unsecured note of doubtful value. He made promises to induce people to send him money on "readers' pool" certificates, and broke the promises. He repeated the promises and again broke faith on building certificates. He induced many women to send him money for subscription purposes under the promise that he would make them members of a league with millions of dollars of endowments. He now admits that, instead of the millions of cash in hand, the so-called league is several hundred thousand dollars in debt. He promised that all these stocks and notes and certificates would be exchanged for bank stock. It was a lie. When notes became due he wrote the holders to send them in for cash payments, if cash was wanted. It was another lie. He got the notes out of their hands, but did not return the cash. Read his papers for three years and see how he lied about membership in the league. Last August he got to his limit for cash on the old schemes and promised to turn over everything he had in the world to some sort of a straw man who was to issue debentures to pay all his debts. Read his paper for six months following and see how he lied about this scheme. That failing, he now has a new scheme to get all of the evidence of indebtedness and criminality out of the hands of his deluded dupes. It is the judgment of every disinterested business man and lawyer familiar with his affairs whom we have consulted that he has been insolvent for years, that he has no paying business, and that he has kept up an appearance with the money borrowed from country people on these schemes.

This, Senator DAVIS, is part of the record of the man you have championed in the United States Senate. Are you proud of your hero?

BANKRUPTCY.

We have the following dispatch from St. Louis:

"Claud D. Hall, local attorney representing creditors from all parts of the country, has filed involuntary bankruptcy proceedings in the United States district court against the Lewis Publishing Co., and also a suit to foreclose mortgage against the University Heights Realty & Development Co. and People's Savings Trust Co., trustee in mortgage dated June 4, 1909, and for appointment of receiver for real estate covered by said mortgage, and a temporary restraining order was granted."

Among other allegations in the petition it is charged that Lewis paid $114,000 for the property in the realty suit and sold it to the company which he controlled for $537,788.16, and on the day of the sale issued a mortgage for $537,788, and sold the notes secured by the mortgage to various persons of all ages and sexes throughout the United States; that no interest has ever been paid on the notes except the first six months, which was paid in advance, and it is alleged as a bait to get people to invest in the notes. Taxes on the property have not been paid since 1906, and suit is pending in the county for four years' taxes. This is charged as a violation of the deed of trust. In addition to this, the People's Savings Trust Co., trustee, had never given any security, although it has trusteeships of $6,000,000 with paid-up capital of only $400,000. Further, that L. B. Tebbetts, chairman of the board of directors, to whose credit a deposit of all moneys was to be made that were received from the sales of lots covered by the mortgage, was adjudicated a bankrupt on February 13, 1911. He never gave any security for his trust, and the court is asked for his removal and the appointment of a receiver for the property. The deed of trust in this case, which the people had a right to expect to be in due shape and legal form, is alleged to be a mere pretense, and made for the purpose of Lewis's realty company and trust company, controlling this property and the proceeds thereof almost indefinitely.

It is also charged that the trust company had authority to convey any or all of this property without the consent of the holders of the notes and without surrender or payment of these notes.

This proceeding looks like the beginning of the end of the Lewis schemes. The attempt to form a board of trustees, under the control of John H. Williams, seems to have failed, partially because publishers with a reputation to sustain were not willing to become a party to it, and, further, because creditors were unwilling to surrender their evidence of claims to Mr. Williams. It has been intimated by Lewis's agencies that there was really nothing in the way of assets left in the Lewis Publishing Co., and that in the case of the bankruptcy proceedings there probably would not be enough of assets to pay the cost of the action. Whether this is so or not, the suspense may as well be over, and creditors may as well know the worst as to delude themselves with vain hopes.

Creditors of these two companies have now only to place their claims where their interests will be protected. The attorney in this case is Mr. Claud D. Hall, 705 Olive Street, St. Louis, Mo. Claims sent to us will go in with our other claims. We will gladly look after the interests of our subscribers or their friends, and will not receive nor accept any pay for the service, but these claims will now need to be looked after by attorneys at St. Louis, and the usual 10 per cent will probably be charged by them on the amount collected.

In the April 20, 1911, issue of the Censor, a periodical publication published at St. Louis, Mo., the following is said of E. G. Lewis and his various schemes:

THE LEWIS BUG—STRANGE HOW IT HAS INOCULATED SOME SEDATE AND SOBER CITIZENS—HOW HE HAS INFLUENCED BANKERS AND BUSINESS MEN TO PUT MONEY INTO HIS VENTURES, AND THE OUTCOME—IMAGINE A RUBBER BALL, KNOCKED, KICKED, PRESSED, AND SAT UPON, YET ALWAYS BOUNDING INTO AIR IMMEDIATELY ON BEING RELEASED; IN THAT YOU HAVE THE PROTOTYPE OF E. G. LEWIS.

As a usual thing, when a dozen or more suits are filed against a man and he frankly admits that he can not meet the demands made in the petitions, recourse is had to the beneficent Federal bankruptcy act. But not so with Lewis. He deftly unloads the burden on some trustees, whom he permits other people to name, reserves a share of the profits for himself, should anything be made, calmly informs the public that these trustees will hereafter fight any court cases, then smiles contentedly and says: "There, I feel 20 years younger with that burden off my shoulders!" In the next breath he tells how he is going to bamboozle the women of the United States into making a million dollars for him during the next few years. But in order to make his million, net, they will have to make something like $100,000,000 for other people. Half of this sum is to go to the publishers of 108 magazines and the other half to the trustees above mentioned. All Lewis wants is a little million for himself. Just how these women are going to drag in the money and save the defunct publishing company and the dead periodicals, to say nothing of financing the 108 other magazines, is about as clear as down-town St. Louis on a low-barometer day. But Lewis says they will do it. All he needs is 1,000,000 women, each of whom will turn in $100. Easy, isn't it? One of the returns they will receive is an opportunity to try female suffrage on themselves and see how they like it. Lewis promises to start a female republic, make University City the capital, and let the $100 subscribers to the thing, whatever it is, play at electing a president, senators, representatives, etc.

Isn't it curious how Lewis has always worked the women? The Woman's Magazine, the Woman's National Daily, the Woman's Farm Journal, and now the Woman's League, all aimed to draw the coin from the fair sex. And yet, if you follow his style of writing, you can understand how he does it.

I give due credit to the Senator from Arkansas that he was influenced by this kind of argument, and in a certain sense it is much to his credit, indicating as it does the possession of sentiment and a large degree of compassion.

A woman dotes on a martyr. And as a first-class, long-suffering martyr Lewis heads the list. He can give cards and spades to those old duffers who were stoned to death or fed to lions. When Lewis gets down to the business of writing a story of his martyrdom he can beat the sob squad on any New York yellow newspaper. I once heard a lawyer, describing a mean man, say in his peroration: "Why, gentlemen of the jury, the defendant is so mean that he would boil potatoes for the pigs in the tears of widows and orphans." Now, if that man had only been hitched up with Lewis, the tear producer, what a spud-cooking establishment they could have operated. "How I have suffered at the hands of the Federal authorities," is the favorite pulse increaser and eye moistener, and it is always placed in juxtaposition with an appeal to please send in a dollar, or a half, a quarter, or even a dime to help the great fight along.

Now, I ask unanimous consent to add such portions of the article as may be pertinent to the issue, and also, Mr. President, to include certain letters very recently written in regard to this publication and these business enterprises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The following is the matter referred to:

* * * * * * *

I first heard of Lewis in Memphis, Tenn., when he blew in from some mysterious realm with a bug or rat poison. He persuaded a drug-store proprietor to let him put his stuff on sale; then, to attract attention to it, he secured a number of live rats, so runs the story, and penned them up in the show window of the store. When he came to St. Louis he went to John Mueller, then editor and proprietor of the Shoe and Leather Gazette, to have some circular letters printed. Mueller told me the man had just a lone $5 bill. I have heard Lewis say many times that he had less than $5, and I have also heard him declare that he had just $1.25. The circulars that Mueller printed for him, I have been told, were his start in business here. The proposition in brief was that the recipient of the circular should send 10 cents and get 10 more of the circular letters. There should be sent to 10 persons, each being requested to send 10 cents for 10 circulars, and on and on and on. The final proposition was that when the chain was completed the sender of the dime should receive a $30 watch or bicycle. I am told by persons who were in touch with Lewis at that time that in a very little while his mail became so heavy that he had to take two big clothes hampers to the post office. In a little while he had a small army of girls opening the letters and taking out the dimes and stamps.

Suddenly the United States Government stepped in, and then began his war with Uncle Sam, and he seems to have been having that war ever since. The chain-letter scheme was knocked on the head, but the man figured out that if he was issuing a publication of some sort he could work the same scheme through it and dodge the law. Then was when he got hold of the Winner Magazine. It was printed in the basement of the Wainwright Building, the type being set at a job office. The same chain letter or premium scheme, slightly modified, was carried on, the subscription price of the magazine being only 10 cents a year. The thing prospered and money came in a perfect avalanche from all over the country, but always from the back counties and rural districts. In those days, when the claim was made that the Woman's Magazine, which was the successor to the Winner, had a circulation of over a million copies, not a copy of it was ever seen in St. Louis, where it was printed, nor in any other city or even large town, so far as I could find out. The business grew so that the idea of having their own printing plant took root, and then came the plant out where is now University City.

Lewis says he shall devote himself for the next five years to getting a million subscribers to the magazines he has on his list, and if he succeeds he is to get a million dollars. He always talks in millions. I have heard Lewis tell how he was once a book agent; a book agent he is, according to his own announcement, to-day. It has always amused me to read Lewis's heart-rending declarations of how he "sacrificed his private fortune" to save his enterprises and to protect those interested in them. Since he started with less than $5—with only a dollar and a quarter, as he has been so fond of declaring—how much of a private fortune has he sacrificed? It seems to have been a clear case of other people's money from start to finish, and I have read with interest his declarations of what he is going to do in the future and of his hopes for reclaiming all his enterprises at or before the end of five years. But I have also heard whispers of a plan for a trip abroad "on account of his health." If it is true that he has a "kick" full of ready cash, he can have a mighty fine time abroad, and perhaps might never want to return to St. Louis. I have also heard a great deal said about the wonderful genius of the boyish-looking fellow. It is well in taking note of things to remember that he is close to, if not beyond, the half-century mark in the journey of life. He testified in court nearly three years ago that he was "past 47 years old."

It is funny to look back. Lewis was going to establish a world-famous art school, and he did rope in some pupils. Lewis was going to establish a school of journalism, and he did map out a program, and paid for a few of the lessons for which he contracted. Lewis was going to establish the most wonderful pottery in the world, having discovered most remarkable clay on his real-estate holdings, and he did bring a teacher over from France. Lewis launched the fiber stopper company and sold a great deal of stock, but where are the fiber stoppers? Lewis was going to make the Woman's Magazine and half a dozen other publications the most wonderful in their respective classes in the world. Lewis was going to make the Star the leading newspaper in St. Louis. Lewis was going to build up a bank—two of them, in fact—that would deliver the people all over the United States from the rapacious clutches of the express octopus. Lewis was going to build a subway for St. Louis. Lewis was going to do a thousand and one other things. All gone a-glimmering into the limbo of the things that never were, and in their stead we have a smiling, glib-tongued, and personally admirable, almost lovable, little subscription agent for magazines. I hope he will be able to hold onto his automobile and that natty white duck suit and those white shoes and that white cap he was so fond of wearing; and, above all, I hope he will be able to hold on to his sunny nature and his assertive optimism.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Arkansas has submitted a statement from former Third Assistant Postmaster General Madden, setting forth demands made by Mr. Madden on behalf of the Lewis Publishing Co., on July 14, 1910, and August 13, 1910, respectively, that the Post Office Department advise him specifically as to the postal laws and regulations violated and constituting a basis for the seven civil suits brought in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri for the recovery of some hundred thousand dollars in postage due the department by the company. That these demands were not made in good faith will appear from the fact that while Third Assistant Postmaster General Mr. Madden held two separate and distinct hearings, in which all the matters alleged by the department, and upon which claim for postage was based, were thoroughly inquired into, investigated, sifted, and analyzed before him, and from the further fact that responses by way of answer had been made by the Lewis Publishing Co. in each of the before-named seven civil suits in the United States circuit court at St. Louis, Mo., such answers being verified by the oath of an officer of the company, and from the still further fact that the counsel of the publishing company at the time of the hearings referred to, and also at the time the seven civil suits were brought, as well as at the present time, were also fully advised of the grounds of action. It is manifest, therefore, that the sole object of the company in asking, through Mr. Madden, a second statement of the grounds of action was not for the purpose of information, as they were already fully advised on that subject, but was for the purpose of opening further cavil and dispute, and adding further confusion to an already complicated situation, with a view of distorting the action of the Post Office Department into unfair treatment of the publishing company. The Post Office Department and Department of Justice did, in the premises, the only legitimate and proper thing to do, namely, referred the publishing company to the records of the court where all the matters of inquiry appeared in full, both the law and the facts, of which matters they were at that time and had for a long time theretofore been duly advised.

If the Senator from Arkansas will turn to the report which, under date of January 23, 1911, the Postmaster General transmitted to the House Committee on Claims in regard to House bill 26799, for the relief of the Lewis Publishing Co., he will find a more accurate statement of the facts than he seems to have had the fortune of obtaining in relation to the fancied grievances of the Lewis Publishing Co. during the administration of former Postmaster General Cortelyou. Beginning at about page 9 of that report he will find the facts and the legal authority upon which the Post Office Department collected from the Lewis Publishing Co. some $30,000 in postage. He will also find on pages 6 and 7 of that report that it is absolutely false that the second-class privileges of the two Lewis magazines to which he refers were revoked without a hearing having first been accorded the publishers as required by the law—act of March 3, 1901. The publishers were given a hearing in both cases; in fact, even two hearings were held in each case. The publishers, in response to the department's rules to show cause, appeared at the department, accompanied by counsel and others. The hearings consumed three days, and decision was reached only after the most careful consideration of all the evidence, including that adduced at the hearings. Had the Senator been familiar with the facts disclosed by this report, that degree of fairness I concede to him would, I am certain, have prevented him requesting that the statement of Mr. Madden, the paid attorney of the Lewis Publishing Co., be printed as a part of his remarks. Rather it would have prompted him to throw the statement into the waste basket.

THE FRAUDULENT USE OF THE MAILS SHOULD BE PREVENTED.

Mr. President, we can not be too severe, consonant, of course, always with justice, in preventing the frauds that are carried on by mail. Fourteen years ago an official of the Post Office Department told me that he and his associates could compute with substantial exactness the amount of money gained by one of these mail-order concerns before they were pounced upon. The average varied from twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars.

I have a report from the Post Office Department stating that the amount taken from the people by those convicted since July 1, 1910, of using the mails for fraudulent purposes is over $26,000,000, and the amount taken by those whose trials are now pending for such offense is almost $50,000,000. Thus over $76,000,000 has been filched from the people by these promoters of fraudulent schemes. This startling figure is more eloquent than any plea I can make that the Post Office Department be encouraged and assisted in its efforts to stay the hand of the spoiler.

It is pathetic, Mr. President, to go into some of the communities in this country and find the number of people who have been robbed by these enterprises, deluded by some promising advertisement—and not merely robbed, but oftentimes deprived of the last dollar of their savings. I have seen widows, elderly women, day and night, anxious over one thing, "Will there be any return from the enterprise in which we have placed our money?" They were trustful, little thinking anyone who would publish such an appealing account could be a rogue, and feeling that everything is sacred that appears in print.

The strong arm of the Government has been raised to stamp out these frauds. I have before me a long list of some of the most flagrant of these abuses. If there is a newspaper under suspicion—I do not charge that this newspaper is given to promoting these schemes—but if it is under suspicion, the best course to pursue is not to attack the Post Office Department, but rather to ask them to exercise a scrutinizing eye and to protect the old, the innocent, and the unsuspecting from being defrauded by this class of schemers.

I would be the last man to rise from my seat and suggest anything that would embarrass the Post Office Department in its efforts to stay the hand of the spoiler or that would in any way make the postal service less efficient.

People sometimes think that severe rulings are inspired by some whim of a public official. They think that those who make self-sacrifices and face the storm of criticism are of necessity backed by the truth. But we should recognize that, if duty is conscientiously done, it is for us and for our country that these sacrifices are incurred, and it should be our part to applaud rather than criticize those who are doing their duty.

THE EFFICIENCY OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

I think the Post Office Department has established a most commendable record. In a report, out just a few days ago, it appeared that for the first half of the fiscal year ending December 31, 1910, the revenues amounted to $118,573,817 and the expenditures to $118,614,680, a deficit of only $40,863 against deficits of ten and fifteen million dollars in previous years. A department is not to be judged merely by its economy, for there may be false economy. But there is no branch of the postal service that has been neglected. The rural-carrier service has been improved; collections and deliveries in the cities have been more frequent than before; and a larger amount has been paid out for wages—not, perhaps, as much as many employees would desire, but in that event the fault rests not so much with the department as with Congress. The department is spending what we are allowing it to spend and what we are appropriating for it. All along the line there are indications of increased efficiency for the benefit of the people. Wherever there may be defects in management or wherever there may be the slightest wrongdoing or defalcation I will join with anyone in condemning it, but I can not allow an attack to be made here on that department and its officials without replying to it. If anyone comes here winding the robe of sanctity about some person who is not entitled to wear it, then that robe ought to be torn away.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that when the Senate adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been conferring with some of the Senators with reference to an attempt to secure a day to vote on House joint resolution No. 39, and I now ask unanimous consent that upon the 12th day of June we may take up House joint resolution No. 39 immediately after the close of the morning business and vote upon the amendments to the joint resolution and the joint resolution itself before the conclusion of that legislative day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that upon June 12 House joint resolution 39 be taken up for consideration, and that a vote be taken on all pending amendments and on the joint resolution itself before the conclusion of that legislative day.

Mr. GALLINGER. And amendments to be offered, I suppose.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pending amendments and amendments to be offered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Idaho if he has conferred with his colleague [Mr. HEYBURN] on this matter?

Mr. BORAH. My colleague is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I saw his colleague's seat was vacant.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not intend to interpose any objection to the vote being taken at that time, but I think the request is hardly in the usual form. The Senator does not mean that the joint resolution may not be taken up and will not come up between now and the 12th of June?

Mr. BORAH. No; but, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the usual language would be "not later than on the 12th of June."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the request to mean that the joint resolution be finally disposed of upon that day, and that in the meantime, at 2 o'clock or 4 o'clock, as the case may be, on each day it will still be the unfinished business and will retain its position as unfinished business upon the calendar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one word. I understood the request to be that the vote be taken upon that day. If the suggestion of the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] be adopted, the vote might be taken on an earlier day.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not distinctly understand the statement of the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was trying to understand the Senator from Idaho. As I understood the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], his request was that the vote be taken on the 12th of June.

Mr. HEYBURN. That the joint resolution be taken up on that day and voted upon; yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I want to understand now is, if the request is modified, does it leave it so that the vote can be taken prior to that time?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. That is all right. What I was interested in was having the day set definitely.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the unanimous-consent agreement the words "immediately after the morning business."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be understood.

Mr. HEYBURN. That the joint resolution be taken up immediately after the morning business.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the day suggested. I simply desire to have a clear understanding on one point. It will be recalled that when a similar joint resolution was before the Senate at the last session there was some difference of opinion as to whether or not at that time the regular order of the Senate as to the consideration and passage of a bill and amendments to it was set aside by such an agreement. The Chair on that occasion, it will be recalled, held that although the bill had never passed from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, the agreement in that case did away with that order of procedure and required that we should take the vote directly as if the measure had prior to that time been transferred by the action of the Senate from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

I want to say that my understanding theretofore of unanimous-consent agreements in such matters had always been that the effect was to bring the Senate to the immediate consideration of the measure in the status in which it was found at the time when the agreement was made that we were to begin to vote or to consider the matter.

The purpose I have in view is this: I think that if the joint resolution is still in Committee of the Whole when the time arrives when it is agreed that we will proceed with the consideration of it, it is not to be considered that by that agreement we have passed over the intervening steps ordinarily had in transferring a measure from the committee to the Senate and that by that consent we are brought to a vote upon the measure without those intervening steps. To illustrate, in the other House there is a procedure by which the previous question is to be considered as ordered at a particular time. Of course that being so, under that practice it necessarily brings the body to a vote at that particular stage. But I do not understand that it has that effect here, where we have not that particular parliamentary procedure; and, if I understand correctly the agreement in this case, it will be simply that on the 12th of June, at the time indicated, the measure will be taken up, and be taken up in the status in which it may be found at that time, and will be proceeded with in the regular order in which the Senate in other matters proceeds to the third reading and passage of a bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the Chair's understanding. If the Chair may suggest to the Senator from Georgia, the agreement in the preceding Congress to which he has referred provided that a vote be taken at a specific hour. That is not the request in this case, but the request is that the matter be taken up at a particular time and proceeded with until disposed of.

Mr. BACON. I understand that, and that is entirely satisfactory to me. As I understand, the matter is correctly stated, and it will be that when the joint resolution is taken up it will be taken up in the status in which it may be at that time and that we will proceed with it in regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. STONE. We are to take up this joint resolution for consideration and continue the consideration of it until a vote has been reached on the 12th of June, and if in the meantime it is to remain the unfinished business, that means that it will stand in the way of the consideration of any other measure for something more than two and one-half weeks. For instance——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I think if a unanimous-consent agreement is entered fixing a certain day the joint resolution then loses its place as the unfinished business of the Senate and becomes a special order.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. STONE. In that view of it, I have no objectoin whatever to fixing the 12th of June as the day for the consideration of this joint resolution and to continue the consideration of it until it is completed on that legislative day; but I understood the Chair to say a few moments ago that this joint resolution would continue as the unfinished business in the interim.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to have it settled at this point whether the Senator from Texas or the statement of the Chair, as I understood it to be, is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair's understanding was and is that the matter remains upon the calendar as the unfinished business, to be called up two hours after the meeting of the Senate on each day, and to be disposed of when called up in such manner as the Senate sees fit.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Then, Mr. President, I desire to ask the Chair as to this possible situation: Suppose next week the Committee on Finance should report what is known as the reciprocity bill and it goes to the calendar. Can it be taken up and considered by the Senate except on motion, so that it would displace the resolution in charge of the Senator from Idaho as the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could be done. It could displace it as the unfinished business, most certainly, if the Senate so desired.

Mr. STONE. But could it be taken up for consideration, for debate, for a disposition of it finally?

Mr. GALLINGER. It could in the morning hour.

Mr. STONE. I do not refer to the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could, by action of the Senate, be made the unfinished business. There is no question about that. It could be made the unfinished business by the action of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. That would displace the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly, as the unfinished business; but it would not annul this unanimous-consent agreement that on a particular day it be disposed of.

Mr. STONE. Then I understand that if some other bill, on motion, should be taken up after the morning hour——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. The bill would then become the unfinished business, instead of the joint resolution, which is now the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If taken up at the proper hour, it would.

Mr. STONE. After 2 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. After 2 o'clock, for example, when the Senate meets at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Excuse me just a moment, please.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Then, although that bill might displace the joint resolution as the unfinished business, the order which is asked for now would still stand, and on the 12th of June the joint resolution would be taken up for disposition on that legislative day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator correctly states it as the Chair understands it.

Mr. STONE. I think I have no objection, with that understanding.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am speaking for my own action. I agreed to this request for unanimous consent with the express understanding, as stated to my colleague, that the joint resolution would remain the unfinished business. It can readily be seen that no further opportunity might be given to discuss the joint resolution if it were displaced as the unfinished business. It is not probable, in my judgment, that it could be taken up by a vote of the Senate prior to the time fixed for the vote. I would not agree to fixing the time by unanimous consent, except that the joint resolution might have such a status on the calendar as that any Senator who desired to discuss it might have a right to discuss it, without appealing to the Senate any day prior to the day fixed for a vote.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that that could certainly be done during the two hours known as the morning hour. That would give ample opportunity.

Mr. HEYBURN. One might discuss it when it was not before the Senate, of course, under any order of business open to discussion, but I want to preserve the right, not the privilege, to discuss the joint resolution on the part of any Senator who may desire to discuss it between now and the time when the vote is to be taken. When my colleague [Mr. BORAH] spoke to me about it, I told him that if it should remain the unfinished business, retain its status, so that it might be discussed at any time as a matter of right, I would agree to fix the date on which a vote should be taken.

It may readily be seen that otherwise further debate might be shut off until the 12th day of June. That I could not consent to. I regard the matter as one that probably will and should be further discussed as a matter of right, and were a change to be made, I would withdraw my consent to the fixing of that date or any date, because the matter has not been sufficiently discussed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I simply wish to suggest that it has been the very frequent practice, if not the general custom, of the Senate when one of these consents was taken or given, to incorporate or include in it a provision that the measure could be called up at any time in the interval by any Senator who desired to address the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, that suggests a remedy. If the agreement embodies a provision that the joint resolution may be called up as a matter of right, that will afford any Senator who desires it an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. BACON. That has very frequently been done.

Mr. HEYBURN. But if he has to rely on a vote to take it up he might lose any further opportunity to discuss it. The joint resolution should remain as the unfinished business, and that should be a part of the record; and with that condition I will give my consent, so far as my consent is necessary, to fixing a date upon which the vote shall be taken. But if that is not to be respected then I would withhold my consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair state the proposition as it is now suggested by the senior Senator from Idaho? It is agreed by unanimous consent that on June 12, 1911, following the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States, and that a vote shall be taken upon all amendments then pending or to be offered and upon the resolution itself before adjournment on that legislative day, and that meantime the joint resolution shall continue the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. Supposing that the reciprocity agreement should be reported from the Committee on Finance prior to that time, and a motion should be made to proceed to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could not displace this business except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was my intention that it should be in that position.

Mr. PENROSE. I must certainly object to that part of the agreement. I do not want to object to coming to a vote on the joint resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the rules, could not the Senator in charge of this joint resolution ask permission to have it temporarily laid aside? That would let in any——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; that requires unanimous consent.

Mr. CURTIS. It could be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That could be done. Of course, notwithstanding the form of the order in which the Chair stated it, at any time the unfinished business may be laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; and unless some Senator desires to speak, that would not be opposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly it would be done.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not object to that. I doubt if the Senate will be ready—it certainly will not be much more than ready—to proceed with the reciprocity agreement by the 12th of June, and we could dispose of this.

In addition to that, Mr. President, I only desire to say that I am glad to have incorporated in this agreement the specific understanding that the joint resolution is to remain the unfinished business, because in the absence of that understanding my impression is that the practice of the Senate is that a unanimous-consent agreement like this takes the matter from the condition of unfinished business and makes it a special order. That, however, is not material at this time, since the agreement stipulates for the status of the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, I take it for granted that the Senate would regard the obligation not to displace the unfinished business as being protected by the provision contained in the agreement.

Mr. BAILEY. I think, under that unanimous-consent agreement, a motion to do it would not be in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the way I look at it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. It must be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE. Let me see if I correctly understand the Chair. Do I understand the Chair to say that a motion made to take up another bill would not be in order under that unanimous-consent agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; a motion would not. The unfinished business could at any time be set aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE. Then it would lie in the hands of any Senator to postpone the consideration of any other measure until after this joint resolution had been disposed of on the legislative day of June 12?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Only during the hours that the unfinished business has the right of way; not during other hours.

Mr. STONE. It would have the right of way, as I understand it, throughout all that period except during the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Except two hours each day.

Mr. STONE. The two hours.

Mr. President, I do not like the idea, I am frank to say, of making an agreement which puts it in the hands of a single Senator to delay the consideration of important measures for nearly three weeks, carrying us right into the middle of the summer, when it may be, and probably will be, that the joint resolution will drag along with nobody to discuss it.

Mr. BACON. If nobody desires to discuss it, of course something else will be taken up for consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the answer.

Mr. STONE. Let me understand that. If on any given day another bill is on the calendar—say, the reciprocity bill, for I have that particularly in mind—and no Senator is ready or disposed to proceed with the discussion of the joint resolution in charge of the Senator from Idaho, would the consideration of the reciprocity bill be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE. Only by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is all. Since the occupancy of the chair by the present Presiding Officer, he has never seen a time when the unfinished business was not set aside promptly by unanimous consent when no one desired to discuss it.

Mr. STONE. But one objection would prevail?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator did not make himself clearly understood by the Chair. The inquiry of the Senator from Missouri was whether it required unanimous consent at such a time to take up the reciprocity measure. The Chair's reply was that unanimous consent would be necessary to lay aside the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business; yes.

Mr. BACON. But unanimous consent would not then be required, after the joint resolution had thus been laid aside, to take up the reciprocity measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. STONE. Then will the Chair inform me how the reciprocity bill, since we are speaking of that, would get before the Senate if the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Finance Committee, should ask to proceed with it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could be done either by unanimous consent or by a motion after the unfinished business had been laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. And after the bill gets out of the committee. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Provided it gets out of the committee.

Mr. STONE. After what gets out of the committee?

Mr. BAILEY. The reciprocity measure.

Mr. STONE. Of course, the committee may hold the bill indefinitely if it is the wish of the Senate that it should. But if it is the purpose of the majority of that committee—which I hope is not true and I do not believe is true—to hold that measure indefinitely in the hands of the committee a motion might be made to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. And being a debatable motion we might never get a vote on it.

Mr. STONE. We are having some expressions now that seem to indicate a purpose to prevent a consideration of that bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say to him that I am ready to cooperate with him in every proper way to get that bill out of the committee and to get a vote on it. I did not mean that in the sense that I was obstructing the matter at all.

I think the Senator, however, is troubled unnecessarily about getting to the consideration of the reciprocity bill. It is well known to the Senator that we can debate any bill on any other bill, and if the unfinished business is not being debated any Senator can debate the reciprocity question; he can proceed to do so whether he has obtained consent to have the bill before the Senate or not.

Mr. STONE. Sure; he can debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the suggestion of the Chair is a very pertinent one, that the Chair has never, during more than two years, known an instance when the unfinished business was not being debated that it was not laid aside by unanimous consent. It is always done, and I feel sure that just as soon as we get the reciprocity bill out of the committee there will be ample opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. STONE. The Senator knows, of course, as well as anyone that the unfinished business can not be temporarily laid aside, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but I assume that that will be granted. It always is granted.

Mr. STONE. I think it ought to be.

Mr. GALLINGER. But in the meantime——

Mr. STONE. But I have not that supreme confidence that the Senator from New Hampshire seems to enjoy that it would be.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have. My confidence is supreme, because in 20 years I have never known it to fail.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to relieve the mind of the Senator from Missouri on the question of any plan to keep the reciprocity bill in the committee. That was merely a good-natured banter, largely provoked by the fact that the Senator was talking about keeping us here through the hot summer time; and I can understand how corpulent Senators would shun the hot weather.

Mr. STONE. I am very glad indeed to know that the remarks of the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New Hampshire were jocular. It relieves the situation somewhat.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. Just one moment and I am through. I still understand the Chair to hold—and there is no dissent from it, so far as I have heard—that while a Senator may debate the reciprocity bill, if, perchance, it gets into the Senate, in the meantime a Senator can take his place on the floor and say what he may have in mind to say about the reciprocity bill day after day. That might go on, but he can not have a vote on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; the Chair did not say that, and did not intend to say so. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I suggest to him that at any time when the bill is before the Senate, whether it be in morning hour or when the unfinished business is laid aside, if the Senate is prepared to vote, it can proceed to vote on it.

Mr. STONE. By unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not by unanimous consent. It can vote on the bill at that time if the Senate is prepared to vote on it without any reference to the unfinished business.

Mr. STONE. I do not want to put myself in the attitude of objecting to the request of the Senator from Idaho, particularly when Senators around me, who are as much in favor of the reciprocity bill as I am, are rather urging me not to do so. But I am very frank to say that I am withholding that objection very reluctantly. I do not think the situation is at all favorable to a consideration of the reciprocity bill, however it may be intended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the order?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I should say that of course I have no intention of interposing an objection to laying aside the unfinished business as a mere matter of tantalizing some one or obstructing. I merely want the right, that any Senator may choose to exercise, to discuss it, and if it is not laid aside by unanimous consent they can go on and discuss the reciprocity measure as well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the request for unanimous consent is agreed to.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe it is getting a little too late to take up a new subject, and therefore I move an executive session.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator from Illinois withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to say that after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow morning I will conclude what I have to say on Senate resolution No. 6.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. NELSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to change the hour of meeting for to-morrow to 12 o'clock noon.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 26, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 25, 1911.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 26, 1911.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by Rev. John Van Schaick, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

THE STANDARD OIL CO. ET AL. V. UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney General, stating by direction of the President and in response to a resolution of the 23d instant that no criminal prosecutions have been begun or are now pending against the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey or the constituent companies or individual defendants named for violations of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman antitrust law, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed. (S. Doc. No. 39.)

LAWS OF PORTO RICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a copy of the acts and resolutions of the special session of the Fifth Legislative Assembly and first session of the Sixth Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BRIGGS presented memorials of sundry citizens of Jersey City, Sayreville, Perth Amboy, Dunellen, Chrome, Kearny, and Newark, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of Local Union No. 45, National Brotherhood of Operative Potters, of Trenton; of Cigar Makers' Union No. 428, of Trenton; of General Teamsters' Union No. 78, of Trenton, in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the abduction of John J. McNamara from Indianapolis, Ind., which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM presented memorials of the Unity Church Society, of Hinsdale, Ill.; of the Vergnuegungs Club Unter Uns, of New Brunswick, N. J., and of sundry citizens of Jersey City, N. J., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Pontoosuc, Ill., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Urbana and Champaign, Ill., remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES. I present a petition on behalf of members of Reynolds Post, No. 32, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Washington and Alaska, of Blaine, Whatcom County, Wash., praying for the passage of the so-called Sulloway pension bill. I ask that the petition be read and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Your memorialists, the officers and members of Reynolds Post, No. 32, Grand Army of the Republic, of Washington and Alaska, of Blaine, Whatcom County, Wash., most respectfully represent and pray as follows:

That your memorialists, desiring to preserve the integrity of the Union, spent some of the best years of their lives in the service of the United States, years that were fraught with opportunity for financial gain; that at that time your memorialists were actuated solely by patriotic motives and without consideration of the future.

That now, however, time in passing has laid its hands heavily upon us, and the hardships and exposures incurred in service are having their inevitable effects, and our ranks are rapidly thinning.

That we feel that our good work and that of our comrades in arms merits substantial recognition, and that the country which we preserved should assist in relieving our declining years from want.

That we believe the Sulloway pension bill, if enacted as law, is just and equitable to us, and that it should be passed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, your memorialists undersigned, most respectfully pray that said proposed Sulloway pension bill, or some other equally as good, be passed in order to remove us and our comrades from want during the short remaining period of our allotted lives.

JASPER N. LINDSEY, Commander.
I. M. SCOTT, Adjutant.
T. J. SPOHN, Quartermaster.

Mr. BURNHAM presented a memorial of White Mountain Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Littleton, N. H., remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Local Division No. 3, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Dover, N. H., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventists Church of Keene, N. H., remonstrating against the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Tolna, N. Dak., praying for a reduction of the duty on raw and refined sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Portland, N. Dak., remonstrating against the establishment of a rural parcels-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. O'GORMAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation for the preservation and control of the waters of Niagara Falls, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of Local Division No. 6, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Kings County; of Local Division No. 4, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Saratoga; and of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Batavia, in the State of New York; and of Local Division No. 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Danbury, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Westbury quarterly meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of Local Division No. 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Danbury, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hartford, Conn., praying for a reduction in the duty on raw and refined sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Conn., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the corporation-tax law permitting corporations to make returns at the close of each fiscal year, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Brockton, Mass., remonstrating against any reduction in the duty on boots and shoes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina presented memorials of the State Pharmaceutical Association; of the legislative committee of the State Pharmaceutical Association; of the Riley Drug Co., of Florence; and of the Ligon's Drug Co., of Spartanburg, all in the State of South Carolina, remonstrating against the imposition of a stamp tax on proprietary medicines, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROOT presented memorials of 26 citizens of Mechanicsville, N. Y., remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

JAMES CARTER.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 938) for the relief of James Carter, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 46) thereon.

COST OF LIVING.

Mr. SMOOT. I present a digest from Bulletin No. 93, United States Bureau of Labor, of a report of the British Board of Trade on the cost of living in the principal industrial towns of the United States, together with a comparative summary of reports of the British Board of Trade on the cost of living in the principal industrial towns of England and Wales, Germany, France, Belgium, and the United States. I move that the digest be printed as a Senate Document. (S. Doc. No. 38.)

The motion was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the calendar is in order under Rule VIII. The first business on the calendar will be stated.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States was announced as the first in order on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution, being the regular order as the unfinished business, will go over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts, approved March 4, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over.

The bill (S. 20) directing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding legal title of the United States to sublots Nos. 31, 32, and 33 of original lot No. 3, square No. 80, in the city of Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 23) to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW. was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over, as there are certain amendments being prepared.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

SUNDAY-REST LAW.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order, and the Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation in the District of Columbia on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, to labor at any trade or calling, or to employ or cause to be employed his apprentice or servant in any labor or business, except in household work or other work of necessity or charity, and except also newspaper publishers and their employees, and except also public-service corporations and their employees, in the necessary supplying of service to the people of the District: Provided, That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a Sabbath one day in each seven, as herein provided.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person in said District on said day to engage in any circus, show, or theatrical performance: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed so as to prohibit sacred concerts, nor the regular business of hotels and restaurants on said day; nor to the delivery of articles of food, including meats, at any time before 10 o'clock in the morning of said day from June 1 to October 1; nor to the sale of milk, fruit, confectionery, ice, soda and mineral waters, newspapers, periodicals, cigars, drugs, medicines, and surgical appliances; nor to the business of livery stables, or other public or the use of private conveyances; nor to the handling and operation of the United States mail.

SEC. 3. That any person or corporation who shall violate the provisions of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10, or by imprisonment in the jail of the District of Columbia for not more than 10 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That all prosecutions for violations of this act shall be in the police courts of the District of Columbia and in the name of the District.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. What is the purpose of the Senator, I will ask him?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because, Mr. President—and I speak by unanimous consent only—it is not a measure that should be discussed under a five-minute rule. The questions involved here are of more than passing importance. Many questions are involved; and if the bill is taken up at all, it should be under a rule which would permit its full and free discussion.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I move that the bill be set down for hearing and action on Monday next, immediately after the morning business.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that the Senator can, without postponing it, if he desires, move to take up the bill, and then it will not be under the five-minute rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama may move to take the bill up for consideration notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I make that motion now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that Senate bill 237 be now considered, the objection of the Senator from Idaho to the contrary notwithstanding. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BACON. May I inquire whether the bill has been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has just been read in full.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would move to amend the bill by striking out all of section 1, after the word "charity," in line 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 8, after the word "charity," strike out the remainder of the section, in the following words:

And except also newspaper publishers and their employees, and except also public-service corporations and their employees, in the necessary supplying of service to the people of the District: Provided, That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a Sabbath one day in each seven, as herein provided.

So that the section will read:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation in the District of Columbia on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, to labor at any trade or calling, or to employ or cause to be employed his apprentice or servant in any labor or business, except in household work or other work of necessity or charity.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, my object in proposing the amendment is not that I believe those provisions should be excepted from the legislation. I am opposed to this legislation, and I merely propose the exception as a basis for submitting some remarks upon it, unless the Senator from Alabama desires to make some statement in regard to the bill before it is taken up for further consideration.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I will wait until I hear the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the Senator does not desire to proceed now.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I will wait until I hear what the Senator has to say in opposition to the bill before I shall seek the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have always been opposed to this class of legislation. In the very early days of the settlement of this country we had a great deal of it, and on the statute books in many of the States there are now provisions, which are termed "blue laws," that are ignored. There are some now in existence relative to the District of Columbia that are not observed or enforced.

We can not make people good by legislation. You can punish them for being bad. The spirit upon which this is based, I suppose is the commandment that "six days shalt thou labor." I have never known anyone to propose legislation for the enforcement of that part of the commandment or trouble his mind about it, and yet, I presume, it is just as important, and was intended to be just as operative, as the following provision against performing any labor on the seventh day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that the language "six days shalt thou labor" is a command that men and women shall labor six days?

Mr. HEYBURN. It says "thou shalt labor."

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator has given that a far-fetched interpretation. I am sure the theologians will not agree with him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not a theologian. It may be fortunate for all except myself that I am not. I have a due regard for the observance of the Sabbath, and I believe it should be observed, but I do not believe in legislation compelling one to do it. This measure is of more than passing importance. I had not thought it would pass without considerable discussion. I have heard it suggested that it was a delicate question upon which to speak. I do not feel it to be such. A man who can not discuss his religion has none; a man who is afraid to discuss it has none. I do not think this is an appropriate place to discuss religious questions, except so far as they may be relied upon as a basis of legislation, but I can not refrain from expressing my regret that it is proposed in Congress to deal with the questions involved in this bill. I think I opposed a similar bill on a former occasion, and it was charged in certain places that I was an irreligious person and that I did not believe in orderly conduct on the Sabbath day. There is no foundation for that charge. I have always been a person of strong religious convictions. My ancestors have always been largely interested in religious principle and the development of it. I have followed in their footsteps, and it is because of that, at least in part, that I do not approve of this class of legislation. It was such legislation as this that wrote the annals of bloodshed and oppression and intolerance in the religious history of the world where a part of the people undertook to be sponsors for the conscience of another part.

The bill provides:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation in the District of Columbia on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, to labor at any trade or calling, or to employ or cause to be employed his apprentice or servant in any labor or business, except in household work or other work of necessity—

That is very ambiguous—"or other work of necessity." Who is to be the judge of what is a "work of necessity," the police court? This bill provides that the police court shall have sole jurisdiction of these questions, and if one is haled before that court on Sunday morning for disobedience of this law, then the police court must work. It is not excepted under the terms of this bill from work. The clerks and employees of the court must work on Sunday if a man is arrested and taken before them. However, that is of minor importance.

Provided, That persons who are members of a religious society who observe as a Sabbath any other day in the week than Sunday shall not be liable to the penalties prescribed in this act if they observe as a Sabbath one day in each seven, as herein provided.

In other words, this legislation grants special privileges to people who are members of religious societies. More than half the world and more than half the people in this city are not members of any religious society. It grants a special privilege to those who are which is withheld from those who are not. The law in this land, general and local, was intended to insure perfect freedom and independence to the citizen in regard to the observance of religious principles. So, as a matter of principle, I am opposed to such legislation.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person in said District on said day to engage in any circus—

I agree to that—show, or theatrical performance—

I am in thorough accord with that—

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed so as to prohibit sacred concerts—

That is too indefinite. Who is to say what is a sacred concert? A concert that is sacred to one person or one class of persons is not sacred to another. I adhere to the tenets of a religious body which does not believe in sacred concerts or any other concerts on the Sabbath day; yet this bill selects a class of persons, described in indefinite phrase, who may, under the guise of a sacred or what they term a sacred concert, be exempted from the provisions of this proposed law. What is called a sacred concert is as offensive to the Society of Friends, commonly known as Quakers, as would be any other violation of the sanctity of that day. They do not believe in anything of that kind on the Sabbath, yet this bill undertakes to give some people a license to engage in that kind of diversion.

Nor the regular business of hotels and restaurants on said day—

Of course, hotels should be permitted to pursue their regular business on that day or on any other day—

nor to the delivery of articles of food, including meats, at any time before 10 o'clock in the morning of said day from June 1 to October 1—

If this bill is based upon principle, there is no reason for that exception. You can not make a law reasonable or valid because of any sentiment in regard to the hours of the day in which food may be brought into the house—nor to the sale of milk, fruit, confectionery, ice, soda and mineral waters—

Well, the sale of soda and mineral waters means the keeping open of places of resort that are not necessary. I would allow them to proceed on that day as on others; but we are talking now about a principle upon which a law shall be based—newspapers, periodicals, cigars, drugs, medicines, and surgical appliances—

Cigars can be purchased on Saturday, of course, and carried over to Sunday. Why should a cigar store be exempted from the provisions of this act? Is there any moral principle involved? Must men have cigars on the instant when they feel like smoking?—

nor to the business of livery stables, or other public or the use of private conveyances; nor to the handling and operation of the United States mail.

We have been anticipated in that. The Sunday mail service has been cut off in Washington and also, I understand, elsewhere. I suppose that reduces the expenses of the Post Office Department one-seventh, and accounts for the obliteration of the deficiency in the Post Office revenue. A reduction of one-seventh would more than account for the $17,000,000 deficit which was to be wiped out. Of course the people pay for it. We do not get any mail on Sunday. I suppose that if they would cut off mail deliveries on two or three more days we would not have any expense in connection with the Post Office Department other than the payment of the salaries of the officers. This is a subject of considerable interest to me—much more interest than this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is not quite as accurate as he usually is. The transactions of the Post Office Department are not entirely abandoned on Sunday. I think so far as the delivery of mail by the carriers is concerned, there has been a practical abandonment of that, but the post offices are open for the transaction of business on Sunday all over the country at the present time, and the salaries of the employees are going on just the same as though they were delivering the mail on that day. So that the Senator's mathematics are at fault when he figures out that by that change, which is a limited change, we are saving one-seventh of the expenses of running the Post Office Department.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, I was briefly proceeding to explain the extent to which this service had been diminished, for I am not going to make a speech upon that question. As I know from experience, the delivery of mail on Sunday to people in their homes or to hotels has been discontinued. The saving thus effected would be a large item. I have not as yet made up the figures that would represent that change in the system, but it would amount to a great deal of money.

Mr. GALLINGER. The salaries of the carriers are being paid just the same.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; the salaries of the carriers are being paid just the same, but they are not performing full service for those salaries. A man who received a thousand dollars for delivering mail seven days in the week is now receiving a thousand dollars for delivering it six days in the week, and the only person that is benefited by it is the carrier at the inconvenience of the people of the whole country. I know of no law that authorizes the change to be made, but I am not much astonished at that, because so many things are now done without legal authority that I have merely looked on with astonishment, and my astonishment has not yet exhausted itself, that the lawmakers of the land should quietly submit to an Executive order, or an order of some kind, that diminishes the services to be performed by officers created by authority of Congress. Some one should be called to account for it by Congress.

No man has the right to set himself up as the moral standard of all the community or of any part of the community except himself. As to the use of the Sabbath day, every man, so far as personal acts that do not include any acts of lawlessness are concerned, should be the guardian of his own morals. It was never intended that the law should lay down the rules that should constitute a good man, and say that all men must live up to those rules. That never was the intention of the lawmakers, and we discovered it very soon after we became a Nation and had organized government, and we abandoned that kind of legislation. It was the legislation that resulted in whipping people at the tail of the cart, placing them in the stocks, branding them upon the hands, and so forth. That was this kind of legislation under which some person or coterie of persons undertook to set themselves up as the censors of the morals of the people. I thought that age had passed. I never expected to see it revived, and I never expected to see an attempt made in the Congress of the United States to prescribe rules that are intended, I presume, to supplement the Ten Commandments, and I suppose every year, according to the temper of a part of the people, we shall have new prohibitions and restrictions

This bill, I believe, does not cover baseball. I wonder why. I wonder that this august body should have omitted the mention of a pastime of which many of its Members are so fond. There is no provision here against baseball or football or golf. Golf could hardly be termed a religious exercise [laughter], but it affords ample opportunity for meditation as the players pass over the golf links, and it may be that in that way it performs some good, but it should have been mentioned one way or another just out of respect for the pastime.

Mr. President, if it is a great principle that should be recognized by legislation, then it should not contain the exceptions of cigar stores, ice-cream parlors, soda fountains, and places of that kind. If you are going into this question, go into it to the limit, and compel the people to live like the old Puritans of New England did, when they were not allowed to have fire in their churches and when they had to take their luncheons with them and eat them in cold sheds or where they might. If you are going to be erratic in legislation, be erratic according to some established rule, the rule of our ancestors. If you are going to recognize the rule that is recognized, or, at least, I thought it was, in all parts of this country, of religious freedom and freedom of personal action so long as it violates no law of the land and no contractual right of anyone—if you are going to uphold that kind of religious freedom—you can not pass this bill.

What authority have we, whence do we derive authority, under the Constitution to enact legislation that will interfere with the personal action of a citizen that is in violation of no law applicable to the whole country? Where else in the United States does such a law as this exist? Are we going to have one code of morals in force by virtue of a law of Congress in the District of Columbia and allow people to go right outside into the State of Maryland and perform the acts that they are not allowed to perform in the District of Columbia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why not?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator asks me why not. Are we going to convert the District of Columbia, then, into a sanctuary, into a great church, so that the citizen must get out of the District of Columbia in order that he may enjoy the ordinary and reasonable freedom of a citizen?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator must know that in a large number of the States, though not in all the States, laws very similar to this are now on the statute books. The Senator must know that in regulating the liquor traffic we have prohibition in one State and local option in another State, and I do not suppose that that is an anomaly which would come under the Senator's condemnation. I see no absurdity or contradiction in legislating for the District of Columbia on any matter different from what Maryland or Virginia or any other State may think it wise to do. So I think the Senator's contention is not well grounded on that point.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator be in favor of enacting a law such as this, if we had the power, that should be applicable to the whole Nation?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would on this subject. I do not know that I would take the exact phraseology of this bill; but I would in a general way.

If the Senator will permit me, as an illustration, two great buildings have recently gone up in the city of Washington, on the corner of H Street and Fifteenth Street. Every Sunday during the construction of those buildings men and teams have been employed, pounding has been going on on the steel frames; and that is a common thing in the city of Washington. I think it is a very bad condition for the Capital of this great Christian Nation. That is my view.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not approve of that work; but because I do not approve of that class of work, it does not follow that I shall go to the extremes presented by this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; that is right.

Mr. HEYBURN. They have gone way beyond that class of control.

I remember once, a good many years ago, being in a certain town in New England. I arrived there late on Saturday night. I went there only for the purpose of seeing a gentleman on a matter that would occupy a few minutes. On the Sabbath morning I undertook to get a carriage to take me out to see this man. I was asked, when I went to the livery stable, if I wanted it to go to church. I said, "No; I want to go into the country to see a certain man and return in time for my train." They said, "You can not have it; the law forbids hiring carriages except within the lines of religious attendance." I do not know whether that law is still in force or not. I have often remembered it as an instance of unreasonable regulation or rule. No good purpose could be accomplished by it, and it could certainly conduce nothing to my frame of mind that could calm it and make it appropriate for Sabbath observance. I had to wait over another day.

I would not on Sunday have a circus operated or a theatrical performance, and I would not allow, under the guise of a sacred concert, a performance in a theater. What is a sacred concert? To what is it sacred? Why is it sacred? Because they sing a certain class of songs? Perhaps those songs or that music might be very offensive to persons of some other denomination, and if one part of the people are allowed to select certain music and call it sacred, when they go there for no sacred purpose, then there is a discrimination.

There are good, old-fashioned songs that to me are more sacred than the technical music of the day. That is true as to a majority of the people. I have attended some of these sacred concerts in my hours of idleness, and I have not been imbued with any special sacred spirit during that time. No; they did not sing hymns. The Senator from New Hampshire asks me if they sung hymns exclusively. I am fond of music, but the musical performance on those occasions would have been just as appropriate at a theater as it would at the sacred concerts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; always.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] gave notice that he desired to address the Senate at the conclusion of the morning business, and I will likewise say that there is a conference to be held by a committee of this side of the Chamber after adjournment. I learn from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] that he is willing that this matter shall go over until some other day, and if the Senator from Idaho will consent to have that order taken, I think it will greatly accommodate the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. It meets with my most hearty approval.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I am perfectly willing that the bill shall go over, but I give notice that I shall call it up and ask for its consideration and a vote on it on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution:

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar No. 4, Senate resolution 6, by Mr. LA FOLLETTE: A resolution to appoint a special committee to investigate certain charges relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on the 24th of May I received a certified copy of senate resolution No. 78, introduced and passed in the Illinois Senate, and I now read it to the Senate as a fitting conclusion to what I have already submitted touching upon the testimony taken by the committee of that body appointed to investigate certain charges relative to the methods employed by WILLIAM LORIMER in securing a seat in the United States Senate.

Senate resolution No. 78 reads as follows:

Senate resolution 78.

Whereas under senate resolution No. 17 a committee was appointed to investigate charges of corruption and official misconduct against members of this senate; and

Whereas said committee has reported the result of its investigation to this senate, from which it appears that there were important and material witnesses without the State of Illinois whose attendance it could not legally compel and which witnesses refused voluntarily to appear; and

Whereas said committee was seriously impeded in the performance of its duties by what we believe to be the unwarranted action of a certain judge; and

Whereas it appears from the report of said committee that despite its inability to compel the attendance of such foreign witnesses and the adverse action of said judge sufficient evidence was procured to conclusively show that WILLIAM LORIMER was elected to the United States Senate from Illinois by the aid of bribery and corruption;

And by reason of the failure of certain senators and representatives during the different roll calls to carry out the will of the people, as expressed at the polls, in the choice for a United States Senator, which action we deem most reprehensible and should be condemned, and which we hereby condemn, and that without such bribery and corruption his election would not have occurred: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this senate, based upon the report and findings of said committee, that the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in the United States Senate was brought about by bribery and corruption and that he should not be permitted to longer represent Illinois in the United States Senate.

Resolved, That the gravity of the situation, involving, as it does, the integrity and good name of this State and the welfare of the Nation, demands a further investigation and determination of this matter by a body possessing broader jurisdiction and greater powers than does this senate; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transmit to the Senate of the United States a copy of the evidence taken by the said committee, together with the report and findings of that committee and a copy of this resolution, and that this senate recommends that in view of the new evidence found the question of the right of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in the Senate of the United States should be reopened and further investigated by that honorable body, to the end that this question may be finally settled in the interest of the State and of the Nation.

I hereby certify that the foregoing resolution is a true copy and that it was adopted by the Senate of the Forty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Illinois on May 18, 1911.

J. H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that this resolution which I have just read, together with the testimony which the committee of the Illinois Senate have taken in their investigation of this case—and a synopsis of which I have submitted to the Senate—make a strong, conclusive appeal to the Senate for a reopening, a rehearing, and a retrial of the right of WILLIAM LORIMER to continue as a Member of this body.

Mr. President, shortly before the final vote on this case at the last session, when the question was before the Senate of agreeing by unanimous consent to fix a time to vote, I interfered. I objected in the hope that I could, before the Senate completed its consideration and disposed of this case, submit to the Senate reasons why the case should be still further investigated.

After making such objection, I made the most diligent efforts to secure facts of which I had received some intimation, in order to lay them before the Senate and induce it to defer further consideration of the case until there had been a more complete and thorough investigation.

But, sir, with all that I could do, I was not able to come before the Senate so prepared that I would feel warranted in asking that it arrest the progress of the case and reopen it. And therefore, though I felt a moral certainty that the Senate was proceeding to the determination of this vital matter without all the facts in the case, nevertheless I felt obliged, sir, under the circumstances, to permit it to go to judgment on the facts then laid before us. But I was confident that there would come a time when this body would be called upon to reopen and to reinvestigate this case.

So, sir, when the committee of the Illinois Senate began its first taking of testimony I was interested enough to follow its proceedings closely, and when Mr. Kohlsaat was called before that committee I felt morally certain that facts of great importance would be disclosed.

I had previously used my best endeavors to get the consent of men in possession of those facts to submit them to the Senate, with the promise that they would be at hand to offer proof in support of them.

Therefore, Mr. President, as soon as Mr. Kohlsaat appeared before the committee of the Illinois Senate and stated that he had been informed that $100,000 had been raised as a fund to consummate this great wrong, I looked for the facts to come into the light of day for the inspection of this Senate and the country.

I remember, Mr. President, that the question was raised in the debate on the Lorimer case that a most important link in the testimony was wanting. It was contended that while there were witnesses ready to swear that money had been used, no one had been forthcoming with proof to show whence that money came. That was a very significant and noticeable omission in the testimony presented by those who were seeking to make a case against Mr. LORIMER's title to a seat here.

So, Mr. President, I acted as soon as Kohlsaat furnished his testimony to that committee regarding what Mr. Funk had told him. I will say that, from such investigation as I have made personally, I feel warranted in saying that Mr. Funk is a most reputable witness. If a Senate committee should ever take his testimony, I am sure every member of it will be constrained to come before this body and say that no more reputable witness appeared than this man Mr. Funk. I have taken some pains to learn about him.

So, I say, when Mr. Kohlsaat referred to him as the man from whom he had derived the information upon which was based the editorial that first attracted my attention, I felt it my duty to put before the Senate a resolution calling for a new investigation.

I felt unwilling, as a Member of this body, to sit here silent while testimony was being taken in a legislature of one of the sovereign States of this Union tending to prove that a fund of $100,000 had been used to corrupt the title of a Senator to sit here with us in our deliberations and vote day by day in settling the fate of important legislation. The integrity of this body, the standing of the Senate before the people of this country, were involved. I conceive that, sir, to be a matter of great importance, for, after all, we are the agents of the public. The Senate must have the confidence of the public. So, when this testimony became public, I introduced the resolution now pending—Senate resolution No. 6.

Now, Mr. President, in view of the action of the Illinois State Senate and in view of the important testimony which I have been able, however imperfectly, to lay before the Senate, I have no doubts but that this body must conclude to reopen this case.

I provided in the resolution that five Senators, whose names I stated, should be chosen as a select committee, by the Senate, to make the investigation.

Mr. President, when I introduced that resolution, there were no committees of the Senate. Perhaps I ought to qualify that. I believe a resolution had been adopted that the existing committees of the Senate should continue to be the committees of the Senate, in so far as there were quorums, until a reorganization was perfected.

At the time I offered the resolution there was no Committee on Contingent Expenses, and it was not possible for the resolution which I offered to be acted upon by the Senate until it had gone to the Committee on Contingent Expenses and had been returned to the Senate with the report of that committee. I say there was no committee. There was a fragment of a committee. I think there were but two members out of five who had constituted that committee in the preceding Congress.

Now, Mr. President, that resolution provoked criticism—criticism upon this floor, not made in session, but made personally by Members of the Senate. It was subjected to some criticism by a part of the press. The suggestion was made that it was unprecedented. It was criticized as a reflection upon the Presiding Officer of this body; as an unwarranted interference with the prerogative so long exercised by the Presiding Officer under the resolutions which had clothed him with the power of naming special committees.

Mr. President, I want to say that I intended no reflection upon anybody by the introduction of that resolution. I took a course which seemed to me to be logical and consistent and fair. It did seem to me that a new committee raised by this Senate for the investigation of this case ought to be composed of Members of the Senate who had not formed and expressed an opinion on the case. So, Mr. President, in the resolution which I introduced, I named out of the Senate five Senators who could not have recorded any opinion on the case, and who had not, as far as I knew, expressed any opinion on the case as formerly presented. I consulted with none of the Members of the Senate whose names were included in that resolution. I did not then know anything more than was known by any Member of the Senate with respect to the attitude of mind of any one of the five Senators named in the resolution regarding the record evidence that had been taken on the former trial of this case.

That is, Mr. President, a frank statement of what controlled me and of my purposes, of what was in my mind in introducing the resolution to which I am now addressing myself. It was said very generally, by way of criticism, that there never had been a case in all the history of this Senate where any Member of the Senate had presumed to select and name in a resolution Senators to be chosen for special service upon any committee. Mr. President, that is not true.

But, sir, what is the significance of offering a resolution here naming or nominating candidates to be elected upon a committee to perform some service for the Senate? It is but the suggestion of a Senator. It is subject to amendment. It may be overruled. It has been done again and again. Contests on the floor of the Senate have grown out of just such suggestions.

This criticism led me to look somewhat carefully into the record of the Senate upon this subject. One of the earliest precedents I came across in my examination of the subject arose on the 3d of March, 1803. At that time the Senate elected a select committee to consider the impeachment of Judge Pickering. This fact was cited by Senator Tazewell when the impeachment of Judge James H. Peck came up, April 26, 1830. The debates in Congress of April 26, 1830 (vol. 6, pt. 1, p. 384), read:

Mr. Tazewell then read from the Senate Journal as follows:
"In the Senate of the United States, March 3, 1803.
"On motion,
"Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of a district court, be referred to Messrs. Tracy, Clinton, and Nicholas, to consider and report thereon."

Senators well understand that the report of the proceedings of the Senate at that time were not as now a chronicle of every statement made on the floor of the Senate, but a summation of what occurred.

In the Congressional Globe, Twenty-fourth Congress, first session (Dec. 22, 1835), page 24, I find the following:

The Senate proceeded to ballot for a select committee to consider the President's message relative to the northern boundary of the State of Ohio and the application of the State of Michigan for admission into the Union, and Messrs. Benton, Wright, Clayton, Crittenden, and Preston were chosen.

On page 514 of same volume, following debate regarding the deposit of public moneys on May 31, 1836, I quote as follows:

On motion of Mr. Calhoun the whole subject was referred to a select committee of nine members, which on balloting was found to consist of Wright, Calhoun, Webster, King of Alabama, Buchanan, Hendricks, Shepley, Leigh, and Ewing of Ohio.

Mr. President, there was a time when the proceedings of the Senate were not directed and controlled by secret conferences and caucuses held outside the Senate Chamber as completely as they are now. Of that I shall have occasion to say something more definitely a little later, for in contending for the passage of the resolution which I have introduced here I am contending for a principle which goes to the very heart of representative government.

In the first session of the Thirty-second Congress a contest arose over the seat of the Senator from Florida, Hon. Stephen R. Mallory. Immediately upon the presentation of his credentials by Senator Morton, question was raised as to his right to a seat. It was moved—and now I quote from the Globe:

That the credentials of the Senator elect, together with the extract from the journal of the Florida Legislature, be referred to a select committee of five.
The motion was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. Gwin, the election of the special committee was postponed until 1 o'clock to-morrow.

SPECIAL ELECTION COMMITTEE.

[From p. 11.]

The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Senate proceeded to ballot for the special committee agreed to be appointed yesterday to consider and report on the Florida contested-election case.
The President announced that the Secretary had furnished him with the following result of the balloting: Mr. Berrien had received 21 votes, Mr. Bright 21, Mr. Davis 21, Mr. Mason 17, and Mr. Pearce 12. These five gentlemen having received the highest votes, they were duly elected the special committee.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BERRIEN. I would inquire what was the whole number of Senators voting?
The PRESIDENT. The Chair can not tell. It is not usual to require a majority of the whole number to elect members of a select committee. They are elected by plurality.
Mr. BERRIEN. I was under the impression that it required a majority to constitute any act of the Senate. My impression is that we have several times balloted repeatedly for members of committees.
The PRESIDENT. The majority rule applies to standing committees.

* * * * * * *

The PRESIDENT. The rule on the subject, after speaking of the standing committees, says:
"All other committees shall be appointed by ballot, and a plurality of votes shall make a choice."
The Senate having under consideration the assault upon Mr. Sumner, the Congressional Globe of May 22, 1856, contains the following:
Mr. MASON. I move to amend the resolution in such a manner as to provide that the committee shall be elected by the Senate.
Mr. SEWARD. I accept the amendment.
The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended.
The Secretary read it, as follows:
"Resolved, That a committee of five members be elected by the Senate to inquire into the circumstances attending the assault committed on the person of the Hon. Charles Sumner, a Member of the Senate, in the Senate Chamber yesterday; and that the said committee be instructed to report a statement of the facts, together with their opinion thereon, to the Senate."

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

That was not regarded as a reflection upon the Vice President or the President pro tempore.

APPOINTMENT OF A SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

On December 13, 1871, Mr. Anthony (of Rhode Island):

"I offer the following resolution and ask for its consideration:

"'Resolved, That a standing committee of seven, to be known as the Committee of Investigation and Retrenchment, be created to investigate and report on such subjects as may be committed to it by the Senate, such committee to be elected by the Senate as other standing committees.'"

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

This resolution was debated at length, the discussion extending over several pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and taking up the entire session. It was also debated through two or three sessions of the Senate; and thereafter, on December 18, Mr. Anthony (of Rhode Island), perfecting the resolutions which he had submitted, added thereto the following:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Investigation and Retrenchment consist of Mr. Buckingham (chairman)"—

There was a Member on the floor of this Senate assuming to nominate the members of that committee—

"to consist of Mr. Buckingham (chairman), Mr. Pratt, Mr. Howe, Mr. Harlan, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Pool, and Mr. Bayard."

The name of Mr. Casserly was later added as a member of the proposed committee.

The debate upon the resolution as perfected by Mr. Anthony proceeded throughout the session of December 18. The resolution was further amended by providing "that the said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers and report by bill or otherwise, and also to appoint a clerk."

While that was called a standing committee, Mr. President, all the debate shows plainly that it was a committee that was chosen upon the nomination of a Senator, and with a view of searching, just as political parties sometimes do preceding an election, the records of the departments of the opposition party in the hope that they may discover matters which will be helpful to them in the campaign. It was in character just like a special committee, although it was called a standing committee.

During the debate some question was raised as to whether the resolution named the Senators who had been the strongest advocates of the Committee on Investigation and Retrenchment, and it was argued at some length that the committee should be composed of the Senators who had been most favorable to the forming of such committee.

Shortly before the adoption of the resolution the following proceedings occurred:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on adopting the amendment as amended.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer this amendment: To strike out the names in the original resolution, namely, "Mr. Buckingham (chairman), Mr. Pratt, Mr. Howe, Mr. Harlan, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Pool, Mr. Bayard, and Mr. Casserly," and in lieu thereof to insert: "Lyman Trumbull (chairman), Charles Sumner, Eugene Casserly, Thomas F. Bayard, Henry B. Anthony, Roscoe Conkling, Oliver P. Morton, and T. W. Tipton."

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question, being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 27, absent 32.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question upon the final passage of the resolution creating the special committee and naming the members of the committee in the resolution, being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 43, nays 1.

Mr. President, I am willing to argue this case and to submit the resolution which I have offered to the Senate just as though no precedent could be found for it. If the adoption of this resolution providing for the election of a committee really made a new precedent it is high time it were done. I stand here to say, however shocking it may be to the sensibilities of some Senators, that other precedents of like character should follow.

When the Senate has a particularly important task to do, which can be better done by the selection of a special committee of its Members, the Senate itself should name and elect such committee by direct vote of the Senate.

It should not delegate such selection to the Vice President or to any individual Senator who may be temporarily presiding. I mean no disrespect to the distinguished gentleman who occupies the high office of Vice President, or to any Senator who may have acted as temporary presiding officer, but I lay it down as a great fundamental principle of government that "no power ought to be delegated which can be fairly exercised by the constituent body."

Sir, I believe the time is near at hand when we will change the present practice of naming regular or standing committees of the Senate.

It is un-American, it is undemocratic. It has grown into an abuse. It typifies all of the most harmful practices which have led an enlightened and aroused public judgment to decree the destruction of the caucus, convention, and delegate system of party nominations.

Under the present system of choosing the standing committees of the United States Senate a party caucus is called. A chairman is authorized to appoint a committee on committees. The caucus adjourns. The Committee on Committees is thereafter appointed by the chairman of the caucus. It proceeds to determine the committee assignments of Senators. This places the selection of the membership of the standing committees completely in the hands of a majority of the Committee on Committees, because in practice the caucus ratifies the action of the committee, and the Senate ratifies the action of the caucus.

See now what has happened: The people have delegated us to represent them in the Senate. The Senate, in effect, has delegated its authority to party caucuses upon either side.

The party caucus delegates its authority to a chairman to select a committee on committees. The Committee on Committees largely defer to the chairman of the Committee on Committees in the final decision as to committee assignments.

The standing committees of the Senate so selected, Mr. President, determine the fate of all bills; they report, shape, or suppress legislation practically at will.

Hence, the control of legislation, speaking in a broad sense, has been delegated and redelegated until responsibility to the public has been so weakened that the public can scarcely be said to be represented at all.

Mr. President, I believe the day is near at hand when Members of this body will refuse to permit the secret senatorial caucus to exercise any controlling action upon the public business.

In the course of my reading I came upon a most interesting discussion bearing on this important subject, and it confirmed me in a thought, Mr. President, which has often come to my mind, that in every day and generation there are a few men who rise above the common lot of us, a few men who from their high eminence look out with the eye of prophecy on what is to come. They, sir, are the real statesmen of their time. The mere politician seeing the event of the hour, if honest in his service to the public, applies the best remedy he can to meet the evils of the hour; but real statesmanship is that quality of mind which grasps the facts of a day, and on those facts projects its vision into the to-morrow.

I came on this quotation from Charles Sumner touching on the control of the action of this great representative body by secret caucuses, held behind closed doors, to enthrall the free mind of the public servant. Let me read you these words that once fell in this Chamber from lips now dust:

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to make one remark before this debate closes, if it ever shall close.

Something has been said about senatorial caucuses. Now, I shall make no revelation, but I shall repeat what for 10 years I have said in this Chamber as often as occasion allowed. A senatorial caucus is simply a convenience. It is in no respect an obligation on anybody. To hold that it is is infinitely absurd and unconstitutional. I mean that—I say—it is infinitely absurd and unconstitutional. We are all under the obligation of an oath as Senators obliged to transact the public business under the Constitution of the United States. We have no right to desert this Chamber and go into a secret conclave, and there dispose of the public business. I say that it is absurd and unconstitutional to pretend that you have.

I make a great, broad, clean distinction between a nominating convention outside, or a caucus outside and a senatorial caucus. A nominating convention or a caucus outside is held in the light of day; it is open; there are reporters present; it is under the direct eye of the people.

I wish I could have had this 15 years ago. I wish I could have known the next utterance that I am to read and have quoted it in the hard struggle that we had in Wisconsin to bring government a little closer to the people; that long struggle to tear down those instruments for manipulating government by political machines—the caucus and the convention. In that contest to remove those artificial barriers between the citizen and the public official these words that I am now about to read from Sumner would have been of great service:

I think—

Mark you, this was uttered away back in 1871. What prophetic vision the man had!

I think that all patriotic citizens are beginning to recognize that even that—is a very questionable form of proceeding, and I know that there are many who are looking about anxiously for some way in which to supersede it. But there is an immense difference between such an assembly and a senatorial caucus. The senatorial caucus is secret; it is confidential, if you please; it has no reporters present; it is not in the light of day. Why, sir, to take the public business from this Chamber and carry it into such a caucus is a defiance of reason and of the best principles of government. A Senator has no right to abdicate his duties here in this Chamber. He has no right to go into a secret chamber and there constrain himself in regard to the public business. * * *

That is referring to a political convention with open doors—the public political convention—

What I say now I do not say for the first time in this Chamber. * * * In making this protest I say nothing new, but I do it now under a profound sense of duty. Sir, I am one of the oldest members of the Republican Party; in some measure I am one of its founders; I am the oldest Senator in service here; and I bear my testimony now as a member of the Republican Party and as a Senator against the pre-tension which is set up that a senatorial caucus can exercise any constraint or obligation with regard to public business. It is nothing but a convenience—that is all—and anyone who goes further and insists that it is an obligation runs against the Constitution of his country.

Now, Mr. President, I want to address myself for a few minutes to the effect of carrying the business of the Senate, the public business, into caucuses and disposing of it there. Take, sir, the action of the caucuses of the two parties reflected in the committees, reflected particularly in the appointment and assignment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. And at this point I read into the RECORD the following tabulation:

MEMBERS OF FORMER COMMITTEE THAT REPORTED ON LORIMER INVESTIGATION WHO ARE MEMBERS OF PRESENT COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Senators DILLINGHAM, GAMBLE, HEYBURN, BAILEY, PAYNTER, JOHNSTON of Alabama, and FLETCHER—7.

MEMBERS OF PRESENT COMMITTEE WHO SERVED ON SUBCOMMITTEE OF LORIMER INVESTIGATION.

Senators GAMBLE, HEYBURN, PAYNTER, JOHNSTON of Alabama, and FLETCHER—5.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that I was not a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not wish to commit any error.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not serve on the subcommittee. I never was on the subcommittee. I was on the general committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator for the correction. I think that is the only mistake I have made.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was Senator Frazier, of Tennessee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Senator Frazier, of Tennessee. He is not a member of the present committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Or of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Or of the Senate. That leaves on the present committee four instead of five Senators who served on the subcommittee. I thank the Senator for the correction.

MEMBERS OF PRESENT COMMITTEE WHO, AS SENATORS, VOTED THAT LORIMER WAS DULY ELECTED.

Senators DILLINGHAM, GAMBLE, HEYBURN, BRADLEY, OLIVER, BAILEY, PAYNTER, JOHNSTON of Alabama, and FLETCHER—9.
Total number of Senators on present committee—15.

MEMBERS OF PRESENT COMMITTEE WHO, AS SENATORS, VOTED THAT LORIMER WAS NOT DULY ELECTED.

Senators CLAPP, SUTHERLAND, and JONES—3.

MEMBERS OF PRESENT COMMITTEE WHO WERE NOT MEMBERS OF SENATE WHEN LORIMER CASE WAS CONSIDERED AND DECIDED, THIRD SESSION, SIXTY-FIRST CONGRESS.

Senators KENYON, KERN, and LEA—3.

Now, Mr. President, I have a few more words to say as to what committee should be put in charge of this investigation. Whatever may be said hereafter, I wish to record as a part of what I utter here to-day that I have no personal reflection to make upon any individual. I am arguing for the appointment of a special committee of new men to investigate this matter, because I believe the mind of the average man the country over must, as my mind does, revolt against the idea of submitting this case to a jury or body of men who have already passed upon facts with respect to it. I say, Mr. President, the fact that new—and highly important—testimony has come to our attention can make no difference in the psychology of the case.

The human mind operates in certain well-known and clearly defined lines. It reasons according to well-known and clearly defined principles.

Mr. President, I want to bring the Senate back, if I can, for a moment, to the importance of the business we have in hand. The office of United States Senator, as every one of you must feel, is one of tremendous power.

The vote of a single Senator may change the entire economic policy of the Government. It may unjustly impose vast burdens upon the citizen. It may unsettle our whole financial policy. It may, in effect, subvert the liberties of the people, and set in motion a train of evils which, in the end, will undermine and destroy our free institutions. A single vote may do that.

Mr. President, it is a deeply significant fact that for 70 years after this Government was established the United States Senate had never been humiliated by a call to investigate a charge of corruption in the election of one of its Members.

Since that time, 11 Senators have been summoned to the bar of the Senate to defend against the charge of bribery. In recent years the allegations of fraud and corruption in connection with the election of United States Senators have been rife in scores of legislatures where the positive and direct evidence, always so difficult to secure in bribery cases, has failed to warrant filing formal charges.

It is within the knowledge of Senators on this floor—it must be—that there are scores of cases where charges of gross corruption have been too specific not to find lodgment in the public mind, and yet not definite enough to warrant the bringing of the case to this bar. Some States in this Union have had cases of that sort recur session after session. Seats have been vacant here session after session because of struggles involving bribery and corruption that prevented the consummation of an election. This thing is coming too frequently into the life of the people of this country. I just suggest that, Senators, to plant in your minds at this moment a fact well known to you, to remind you of it as we approach final determination in the matter of reopening the Lorimer case.

A study of the 10 bribery cases—consider this, Senators—a study of the 10 bribery cases tried here in recent years discloses a growing tendency toward the establishing of precedents which make it increasingly difficult to convict, excepting in cases where the proof is overwhelming and notorious. The tendency is all the wrong way.

The decision in the Lorimer case makes another of these unfortunate precedents. In some respects it stands alone—a dark page in the history of lowered senatorial standards.

Blind, indeed, the men who will not see the certain and inevitable result!

The abolition of caucuses and conventions and the nomination of all candidates by direct vote; the election of United States Senators by direct vote; the nomination of presidential candidates by direct vote; the initiative, the referendum, and the recall—all these are but the logical outcome of the betrayal of public trust by public officials.

There has grown up in high places a scorn and contempt for the plain citizen. It has become common to refer to the people as a "mob" and to the people's rule as "the rule of the mob."

Mr. President, constitutions and statutes and all the complex details of government are but instruments created by the citizen for the orderly execution of his will. Whenever and wherever they fail, they will be so changed as to make them effective to execute and express the well-considered judgment of the citizen.

For over and above constitutions and statutes, and greater than all, is the supreme sovereignty of the people!

We need not fear, Mr. President. This is the people's Government. They will not destroy it. They will not permit organized privilege to destroy its vital principle. They will restore and forever preserve it as a Government that shall be truly representative of the will of the people.

They know that the initiative and referendum will place in the hands of the people the power to protect themselves against the mistakes or indifference of their representatives in the legislature. Then it will always be possible for the people to demand a direct vote and to repeal a bad law which the legislature has enacted, or to enact by direct vote a good measure which the legislature has refused to consider.

The recall will enable the people to dismiss from public service a representative whenever he shall cease to serve the public interest. Then no jack-pot politician can hold his office in defiance of the will of a constituency whose commission he has dishonored.

Wherever representative government fails, it fails because the representative proves incompetent or false to his trust. Intrenched in office for his full term, his constituency is powerless and must submit to misrepresentation. There is no way to correct his blunders or to protect against his betrayal. At the expiration of his service he may be replaced by another who will prove equally unworthy. The citizen is entitled to some check, some appeal, some relief, some method of halting and correcting the evils of misrepresentation and betrayal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the initiative, referendum, and recall will insure real representative government and will prove so effective as a check that it will rarely be found necessary to invoke the powers conferred against unworthy representatives in any enlightened and progressive Commonwealth.

So, I say, Mr. President, it is in the power of the representative to so discharge his public trust as to make the foundations of representative government again secure.

And in the case of WILLIAM LORIMER let us so meet our responsibility that the people, whose servants we are, shall find no just cause for criticism.

The validity of a man's title to a seat in the United States Senate should be considered with judicial fairness.

The Senate is sole judge in every case. It is unhampered by legal technicalities. All the limitations in the consideration of the Lorimer case, or in any case involving the right of any Senator to a seat, are limitations of precedent created by this body itself.

Why this constitutional provision? Manifestly the Senate is left free to take testimony, weigh evidence, and decide as to its Members, because it has the responsibility of maintaining its own unimpeachable legislative integrity.

In the consideration of cases of this kind other parliamentary bodies seem to regard it their first duty to keep the lawmaking power above suspicion and strong in the public confidence. All will remember that in the discussion of this case last session many instances were cited where the slightest taint of fraud or corruption was held to be cause for expulsion from the English Parliament.

No one can review the proceedings, the records, and precedents made by the Committees on Privileges and Elections in recent years and not be impressed with the fact that there is a growing and dangerous tendency to invoke every technical possibility of law and precedent for the protection of the individual accused, instead of recognizing as paramount our highest obligation to protect the honor of the Senate and preserve the confidence of the public.

We should remember that it is not our own private business on which we are engaged, where we might properly permit personal considerations to control our action. We have a public duty to perform of the gravest character upon which the Senate can ever act.

Mr. President, we want the confidence of the American people. We have been too long careless regarding it.

We all recognize that the Lorimer case has taken possession of the public mind. The question involved is a moral one, upon which there is great intensity of feeling. Out of this condition arises the demand that when the case is reopened the new committee shall first of all have the confidence of the American public.

Deeply implanted in the Anglo-Saxon mind is the idea of an unprejudiced jury.

We may be unwilling to admit that we can be influenced by our previous action, but the American people will not accept that view. They will not believe that the committee is unprejudiced and fit to reopen and consider the new testimony in this case which conducted the previous investigation and made a report favorable to the seating of LORIMER, which they defended on the floor of the Senate, and confirmed by their solemnly recorded judgment on March 1.

And, Mr. President, I contend that it is unfair to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to refer this case to it for further investigation.

Its work will be prejudged from the start.

It will be heralded as a "packed committee."

The public believes that the Browne, the Erbstein, the Broderick juries, all in cases growing out of LORIMER'S election, were in each case "packed."

It will be too ready to say that this case is in the hands of LORIMER'S friends.

It may be weeks and months before the committee can conclude its labors.

Is it wise, is it just to the committee, that it should conduct its proceedings under a fire of criticism and public suspicion all that time? Will it conduce to the judicial poise and calm, which, in fairness to the public, the Senate, and the accused, should characterize the proceedings of any committee that investigates this Lorimer case? Could a committee under such circumstances do its best work?

Whatever the committee may report, their action will be misjudged. If they should decide for LORIMER again, will the public think it a fair and unbiased judgment? Will the people be satisfied? If they should reverse their former judgment, will the public believe that they do so from conviction?

In asking that a committee of new men be named I have had no ulterior design. The adoption of this resolution would be no reflection on any member of the former committee. If I were a member of that committee, with my convictions formed and expressed as a result of the first trial, I would not consent to serve on a committee charged with the duty of prosecuting an investigation of all the facts upon both sides of this case and reporting the results of that investigation to the Senate.

I would not feel, sir, that I could stand as a fair representative of this Senate directing me to pursue this inquiry impartially as to both sides or with equal vigilance as to both sides.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. BACON. Of course the Senator recognizes that the ultimate decision of this question is to be by the Senate. When the question was before the Senate upon a former occasion both the Senator and myself voted that Mr. LORIMER was not entitled to his seat in the Senate, because, according to our judgment, upon the evidence taken his election had been procured by corruption; and I want to say that the Senator was not more fixed in that conviction and conclusion than I was, and I have never seen any reason to change my opinion in that regard.

The question I wanted to ask the learned Senator is, whether in view of the fact that we are to be the ultimate judges after the work of this committee shall have been completed, the reasoning of the Senator in this case would not disqualify both himself and myself from sitting as final judges in the case?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the question of the Senator from Georgia to my mind is very easily answered. I take it that Senators will vote as they believe right on the record that is presented here. But I, Mr. President, would conceive it to be a very different office to be sent out to search the country over for the facts upon which the Senator from Georgia and other Senators must finally act. I take it that Members of the Senate who are lawyers will, and must, when their attention is directed to it, readily see that there is a wide difference between passing upon the facts as they shall be established by the sworn proof brought in, and making an excursion over the country to secure those facts. A little less vigilance here, a little more activity there, a present notion of what testimony is admissible, a fixed idea as to the bearings of the evidence written into the past record of the Lorimer case, these influences, acting as a check and a hamper upon the free exercise of the mind of the man who acts on the committee of investigation, will all have a most important bearing on the character and thoroughness of that investigation.

We are none of us, Mr. President, free from those influences which come to us as a result of the positions we have taken and defended in the past with all our zeal; and I say, sir, that there is a wide difference in the office that shall be performed by Senators who sit here to pass upon the information that is to be brought back to the Senate out of this investigation and the office performed by the men who shall go out to make that investigation.

For my part, sir, I want this Senate to send out men who are absolutely free. I mean by that men who are free from any preconceived convictions about conducting the case. My use of that word reflects not in the slightest upon the integrity or the honor or the sensitiveness of any Senator. Nearly all Members on this floor are lawyers. I do not believe there is a man here who would be willing, or ever has been willing, to take a case into which he could not enter fully and whole-heartedly, without restraint, without reservations. I would not. I never did. If a client came to me with a case and did not seem to have the right side of it I let him go. According to my view, that is right. I am subject to mistake, I admit, and that may be a narrow view, but it is what guided me in my professional life. When I enlisted for a client, I enlisted my best services.

I believe we ought to select men here who are not zealous against Mr. LORIMER or zealous for him, but men who will recognize, first of all, that the public has the paramount right in this case, then the Senate, and then Mr. LORIMER; that they must conduct their investigation with perfectly free minds, pursuing and recording and bringing to the Senate every fact that will tend to prove that Mr. LORIMER was honestly elected; pursuing every fact that will tend to prove the contrary, of which there are witnesses ready to testify, so that when their duty is performed there will be no shred of testimony left lurking in any secret place in Illinois or elsewhere that can aid the Senate in arriving at a just conclusion.

I do not believe that work can be done by selecting men who have been on the case before. I say that without any disparagement to those men, and I would say it as freely if I myself had been on the former committee. Had I been assigned to the Committee on Privileges and Elections—and I would have been glad to have had an assignment on that committee, because it is work of investigation for which I have a liking—I would still have felt constrained to criticize my right to sit as an investigator in this particular case upon which I had previously acted. Every Senator must act for himself. I have no word of criticism for any Senator who holds views to the contrary. Even supposing a select committee did not do any better work than the Committee on Privileges and Elections may do, it would still redound to the fairest and most satisfactory disposition of this case if we named new men. A select committee of new Senators would, at the very outset, engage the confidence of the public. It would take up its task without a word of criticism from the public, without anybody saying, "Oh, well, it is all up; the same old result."

Now, that would be unfortunate, even if the result were otherwise. It is not good to have that impression hammered into the public mind over and over again during the next six months. Its influence upon the work of the committee is bad; its influence upon the witnesses is bad; it stiffens up the backs of men who will commit perjury; it fortifies men who would dodge.

Do not, I plead with the Senate, start on the wrong road in the reinvestigation of this case, which has taken such a deep hold upon the mind of the public. Everywhere, all over the country, people are showing a most remarkable zeal in following this case, step by step. Associations and groups of citizens, remote from the State of Illinois, are registering their protests in memorials and resolutions.

Now, Mr. President, to come back to the point at which I was diverted by the question of the Senator from Georgia, I say if I were a member of that committee, with my convictions upon the case formed and expressed, I would not consent to serve on a committee charged with the duty of prosecuting an investigation of all the facts upon both sides of this case and reporting the results of that investigation to the Senate. And, as it seems to me, the Committee on Privileges and Elections would not care to be charged with this grave responsibility, but would prefer to remain free to vote for or against the report of the new committee, according to their conscientious convictions.

If it were a matter outside of the Senate, Mr. President, and such an investigation or reinvestigation of this case was pending in any organized body in any court or forum of any sort in the world and one of the Senators who had previously participated in the case were called upon to serve again, I can not conceive that he would not rise in his place and say, "I served on one committee in this case; I arrived at a conclusion. Of course there has been some new testimony discovered; but, Mr. President, I have certain fixed convictions in my mind on the bearing of testimony upon which I passed and it would take something to root those out, and I do not think that I ought to serve on this committee. I think that a committee or a jury or a body of men ought to be called whose minds are fresh and open."

I say if there is to be a new investigation, it should be an investigation by the Senate itself, if that were possible; that is, such an investigation should reflect in its thoroughness of every detail and in its results, the will of this body.

Now, Mr. President, as important as this investigation is to the integrity of the Senate and all its proceedings, that is manifestly not feasible.

But it is feasible, and it is supremely important, that this investigation be made, as nearly as lies within the power of the Senate, the work of the Senate.

How can this best be done?

By turning it over to a committee that has not been appointed with reference to this particular case, a committee that was selected to take charge of questions generally affecting privileges and elections, a committee 7 members of which were upon the committee that formerly passed upon this case and reported that LORIMER's election was valid, a committee 5 members of which constituted a majority of the subcommittee which determined the scope and character of the former investigation; a committee of 15, as at present constituted, of which 9 members, by their votes as Senators, confirmed the title of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in the Senate?

Or should the investigation be conducted by a committee directly delegated by this body, and especially with reference to this case—a committee composed of new men who have not the handicap of a previous judgment; who did not hear, try, and determine any of the issues involved in the former trial, who have no record to constantly confront them, no erroneous rulings made in the former case as to the admissibility of evidence to limit the scope of a new inquiry, no bias as to witnesses who testified before, no mistaken declarations as to the rules of law which should govern, but who, one and all, can come to the investigation of this case with open, unprejudiced minds, both as to the testimony of witnesses taken on the former hearing, and the new evidence which this investigation will uncover?

Is it not in accordance with all the precedents of the centuries behind us that we should commit this case to new men, so long as they are available? And we have new and able men—men strong in the public confidence, bipartisan but nonpartisan. This is not a party issue. It involves the honor of both of the great political parties, the honor of the Senate, and the honor of the Nation.

Mr. President, at the proper time I shall offer as an amendment to my resolution that the names submitted there be stricken out and that the Senate elect by a majority vote, in the open Senate upon a roll call, five Senators to make this investigation, and that only those Senators shall be eligible to serve upon the committee who were not Members of the Sixty-first Congress.

And, sir, I shall still further amend the resolution by providing that it is the sense of the Senate that the investigation shall be made promptly.

I thank the Senate for its great patience in following me.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I speak without their authority, but I am sure that I speak with absolute accuracy when I say that in view of the testimony elicited by one of its committees, and in view of the resolution adopted by the State Senate of Illinois every Democratic Senator favors a further and a thorough inquiry into the election of Senator LORIMER. That was the mind of Democratic Senators before the Senator from Wisconsin began his extended address, and that is the mind of Democratic Senators since he has concluded it.

I think, Mr. President, that I have fairly expressed the opinion of all Democratic Senators in what I have just said, but in what I am now about to say I state the position of only a part of them. We favor this investigation because it is alleged that new and material evidence of corruption has been found, and we feel that if that allegation can be established the Senate owes it to itself, and owes it to the country, to hear it and consider it. But, sir, it is upon this new evidence we base our votes and not upon any dissent from the former judgment of the Senate, nor upon any dissatisfaction with the work of the subcommittee which conducted the former investigation. With some immaterial exceptions, that committee did its work as well as any committee of this Senate could have done it, and it can not be fairly criticized because some who now claim to know about those transactions concealed their knowledge from that committee and afterwards imparted it to another committee or to other people.

If there were no new evidence I would not vote to grant a new trial, because here, as elsewhere, there must be a finality of judgment; here, as elsewhere, we must sometime reach the end of even a proceeding like this; and if, without the discovery of new and material evidence, the Senate of each succeeding Congress could reopen and review the judgment of the preceding Senate, we would forever be in a struggle over questions like this. It happens that this case possesses no party significance, and, consequently, Senators have divided on it without the remotest reference to their party affiliations. But I can not close my mind to the fact that in that respect at least this is rather an exceptional case and that on many occasions there have been party advantages sought and party advantages to be obtained by reopening questions like this.

I have as much respect for public opinion as any Senator ought to have, and, without intending to defy it, I say to the Senate and to the country frankly that public sentiment could not control me in a matter like this. When we come to pass upon the election returns and qualifications of our Members, we act, sir, in a judicial capacity, and if I were a judge upon the bench, I would yield as soon to the clamor of the crowd which thronged my courtroom and demanded a new trial as I would grant it upon the public demand in this case.

We decide these questions upon our oaths. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] himself has well said that we should decide them with judicial fairness. Can we, sir, decide them with judicial fairness with one eye upon the evidence and the other turned toward the angry crowd? Oh, no, sir; the Senate must not be swayed by considerations like that. But I venture to believe that the Senator from Wisconsin has not correctly judged public sentiment on this question. Sir, clamor is not sentiment. To see the newspapers filled with certain demands does not always indicate that the people approve those demands.

Mr. President, even if this were a question in which we might consider public opinion, I would demand to know whether or not that public opinion were well informed, and I am able to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that in this case it is not well informed.

All Senators here, all sensible men everywhere, will agree that before the judgment of any man with respect to this case is entitled to be considered he must have read the evidence and he ought to have studied the law. As the people do not employ their minds about the cold and technical rules of law, I waive that requirement in this case, but I still demand that those who censure us and demand that we review and reverse our judgment shall at least know something about the facts. Do the American people understand them, sir? They are to be found in a printed volume covering more than 700 pages. How many busy men in this Republic have rested from their several tasks to study that testimony? How many men in their homes or about their business places have occupied even their leisure hours in reading it? Fortunately we are not left to guess. True, we can not number them by an actual count, but the records of this Senate furnish us an almost infallible index.

When this testimony was printed, the committee only ordered eight copies of it deposited to the credit of each Senator for general distribution. They did not order a larger edition because the experience of all these years had taught them that there was never an extensive public demand for a document like that, and they believed that to print a larger edition would be a waste of public money. That they judged wisely is made apparent by an examination of the books of the folding room. Let me tell the Senator from Wisconsin that on the day when the Senate took the vote on the resolution declaring LORIMER'S election illegal, out of the 736 copies of that testimony to the credit of Senators for general distribution but 14 copies had been withdrawn. Not only so, but on yesterday 631 of that 736 copies still remained in the folding room.

If millions of these good people have rejected our judgment, upon what have they based their conclusion? On extracts from the testimony printed in the newspapers. Are we to try men in that way? I think not. Mr. President, I believe it is a reflection upon the intelligence of the American people to say that they assume, without having read this testimony, to understand it better than Senators who have studied it under the sanction of an oath.

While that case was still pending I had a personal illustration of how honest men may be misguided by their zeal. I received a letter from a citizen of Illinois, who wrote like an intelligent and an honest man, and he raised the presumption in my mind that he was both by telling me that he had been a lifelong Democrat. He further did me the honor to state that he had for years read with attention and with approval what I had said concerning public questions, and expressed his deep regret that I felt called upon to defend the validity of LORIMER'S title to a seat, whom he declared guilty beyond all doubt. Ordinarily I do not answer letters of that kind, but this man made such an earnest appeal to me and he seemed such a good man that I answered him and told him that as he wrote like a good man, had been a lifelong Democrat, it looked like we ought not to differ very much about a question which we both understood. I told him, further, that perhaps I had overlooked some very important testimony in this case, and if he would point out the testimony which had convinced him that LORIMER'S election was procured by bribery I would be glad to give it renewed and earnest attention. The good man, missing the gentle irony of my letter, replied by saying that he had not seen a copy of the testimony, but that if I would send him one he would examine it and call my attention to it. [Laughter.]

I believe that he was a good man, Mr. President, but his judgment could not influence me, because his judgment was not formed upon information; and I think the state of mind which he exhibited is largely the state of mind existing among the people who are dissatisfied with the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. President, I shall not have anything to say about the contest between a special and general committee, although I could freely discuss that, because I was not a member of the subcommittee previously appointed. But I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Mallory case, which he cited as a precedent, is not in point, because at that time there was no Committee on Privileges and Elections in the Senate. That is rather a curious historical circumstance. The very first contested election case ever appearing here—and I thank God sincerely it involved no corruption—was referred to the Committee on Elections. Let me digress here long enough to tell the Senator from Wisconsin that I rejoice as much as he does that in those first 70 glorious years of this Republic corruption never laid its foul hand upon this Assembly; and let me remind him that in those years we never heard anything about the initiative, the referendum, or the recall. The first case was that of Kensey Johns, involving purely a question of law. The record says that it was referred to the Committee on Elections. The next case was referred to a select committee, and the Senator might have found that in the cases immediately preceding the Mallory case a select committee was appointed in each instance. In other instances questions touching the rights of Senators to their seats were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I have here a volume of Contested Election Cases, compiled by the clerk of that committee, and he has a statement on page 23 that the Committee on Privileges and Elections was organized in the first session of the Forty-second Congress. As a matter of fact, as shown by the records of the Senate, that committee was first appointed on the 10th of March, 1871. Since that time there has been no effort to create a select committee. There has been no proposal to refer these questions to any other committee, except in two instances, as I recall. One was the case of Powell Clayton, which involved some reconstruction conditions in the State of Arkansas; and in that case I think that the motion to appoint a select committee of three prevailed. The other, as I now recall, was the case of Spencer, from the State of Alabama, where again conditions growing out of reconstruction measures were involved. In that instance, if I am not mistaken, the motion to appoint a select committee was rejected.

Mr. President, speaking for myself alone, though I am sure that I could include in that statement every Senator here, if this further investigation shall develop that this seat was obtained through bribery and corruption, the Senators who voted to sustain its validity before will be the first to declare that election void. We acted then upon the evidence and the law as we understood them. Certainly, sir, we acted under every temptation to vote the other way. I knew, and those who agreed with me understood as well as I did, that the public mind had been filled with an unreasonable and unreasoning prejudice in this matter. I understood, and so did they, that a vote to vacate that seat would win for us the approval and the applause of thousands who had never looked into that volume of evidence. We knew, besides, that the vote we gave would subject us to censure from one end of this Republic to the other; but in God's name, were we to do our duty as we understood it, were we to keep inviolate our oaths, or were we to yield to a popular demand?

Mr. President, I believe in a representative republic, and when the people in my State have deliberately made known their will I will obey it or I will return to them the commission which I bear. I am not one of those who believe that a man may keep the people's office and defy the people's will; but, sir, the public will which I respect is one which permits me to respect the obligation of my oath, and a people who demand of me that I ignore the evidence and trample upon the law in a case like this are welcome to my commission whenever it pleases them to ask for it.

I go further, Mr. President, and I say to the Senate and to the country that if it shall transpire upon further investigation that this seat was procured through bribery and through corruption, I and those who acted with me on the former occasion shall have added to our plain sense of duty the motive to set ourselves right—not right, sir, before the country; we do not need to do that, but right before our conscience and before our God. If we have saved the seat of a man who was guilty of buying it, or whose friends bought it for him, we owe a reparation, and the Senator from Wisconsin will not be readier than we will be to make it.

Fortunately, Mr. President, in my opinion, with the lead now furnished to the committee, if corruption and bribery were practiced, the escape of the guilty men is impossible. The committee can take the attorneys for which the resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] provides; they can take the expert accountants, for which it also provides; they can go to the business houses of the men accused; they can go into the banks, and under the process of the Senate they can compel those people to open their books, and with these accountants I have no sort of doubt that if a corruption fund was raised and spent, that fact can be clearly established. And if that shall be done, sir, we will give the country instant and convincing proof that the Senate of the United States will not shelter a corruptionist or the beneficiary of corruption.

But, Mr. President, let us remember this—and when I have said that I am done—let us remember that as important as it is that the Senate shall enjoy the public confidence, it is still more important that we shall preserve our self-respect. I will trust the destiny of this Republic to Senators who would give up their office rather than to do violence to their conscience, but I will not give it into the keeping of men who are prone always to hear and always to heed the emotional exclamations of the people. A Senate, sir, which will sin against its conscience and its judgment is not fit to legislate for 90,000,000 freemen, and it will not safeguard the rights of our children and their children's children through all the years to come. A Senate, sir, conscious of having betrayed itself, will not hesitate to betray our countrymen.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I am not authorized to speak for the Republicans of this body; I can only speak for myself personally and for such of the Senators on this side of the Chamber as I have by chance conversed with; but if there be any Senator on the Republican side who is opposed to the reopening of this case and the prosecution of further inquiry, I do not know who he may be.

It has been known to everybody that an investigation by the upper branch of the Legislature of Illinois has been in progress for some time past, and it is undoubtedly true that every Senator has closely watched, as I have done, the daily press to learn what developments have been made. I was only expressing the conviction which I had reached and which probably others had reached, when on the 22d instant I introduced into the Senate a resolution providing for the reopening of the Lorimer case and for the reference of it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I did that, sir, because I thought I understood the character of this body and its duties under the Constitution, a body that is the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members; and, being the sole judge, is clothed with tremendous responsibilities, which call for the exercise not only of conscience but of a wise judgment and just action.

In looking through the history of election cases which have come before this body, my attention has been attracted to the case of my distinguished friend who sits at my side [Mr. DU PONT]. It occurred in 1897, when upon the presentation of his credentials a seat in this body was denied him. An application was made for a rehearing, but the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom the application had been referred, found that the facts were unaltered, and the request was not complied with; but the committee, at that time consisting of George F. Hoar, William E. Chandler, J. C. Pritchard, J. C. Burrows, George Gray, David Turpie, James L. Pugh, and John M. Palmer, made a report to this body which so fully and clearly sets forth its character as a court, its responsibility, and its duty that I venture to read from it on this occasion. They said:

> The majority of your committee now, as then—

Referring to the previous action—

> The majority of your committee now, as then, are of the opinion that this decision of the Senate was wrong; but the Senate is made by the Constitution the judge of election, qualifications, and returns of its Members, and its judgment is just as binding in law, in all constitutional vigor and potency, when it is rendered by 1 majority as when it is unanimous.
> It is clear that the word "judge" in the Constitution was used advisedly. The Senate in the case provided for is to declare a result depending upon the application of law to existing facts, and is not to be affected in its action by the desire of its Members or by their opinion as to public policies or public interest. Its action determines great constitutional rights—the title of an individual citizen to a high office and the title of a sovereign State to be represented in the Senate by the person of its choice. We can not doubt that this declaration of the Senate is a judgment in the sense in which that word is used by judicial tribunals. We can conceive of no case which can arise in human affairs where it is more important that a judgment of any court should be respected and should stand unaffected by caprice or anything likely to excite passion or to tempt virtue. When the Senate decided the question it was sitting as a high constitutional court. In its action we think it ought to respect the principles, in giving effect to its own decision, which have been established in other judicial tribunals in like cases and which the experience of mankind has found safe and salutary.

They say further:

> We do not doubt that the Senate, like other courts, may review its own judgments where new evidence has been discovered, or where by reason of fraud or accident it appears that the judgment ought to be reviewed. The remedy which in other courts may be given by writs of review or error or bills of review may doubtless be given here by a simple vote reversing the first adjudication. We have no doubt that a legal doctrine involved in a former judgment of the Senate may be overruled in later cases. But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their minds as to the law or fact which is involved.

Mr. President, it seems to me, in consideration of the new evidence which has been discovered by the committee of the Illinois Senate, and in view of the difficulties it has encountered in securing witnesses from other States, and especially in view of the request of that body that the case be further investigated by the Senate of the United States, that this body, possessing this great power, this great responsibility, should follow the lines which the courts of law have always adopted under similar circumstances and grant a new hearing and make further investigation. Such action, under similar conditions, is what has given our courts their stability for more than three centuries. The very fact that they possess great powers has laid upon them great obligations, when a proper case is presented, to open that case to further consideration. For similar reasons and because I became convinced that this body ought to take such action in this case, I presented the resolution before mentioned providing for it.

Mr. President, I need not say any more than this regarding the committee to which the investigation should be committed. I have examined the records from 1855 down to the present time, and I do not find a case where a special committee has been appointed to take into consideration the question of the election of a Senator to this body.

The case of James Shields, of Illinois, in 1853, and the case of Mallory, which has been cited, were sent to special committees. But as has been said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] the Committee on Privileges and Elections was formed in 1871, and every case of this character, from that date to this, has been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The line is unbroken. I have a list of the cases since 1871, which I will place in the RECORD.

The list referred to is as follows:

SENATE ELECTION CASES.

Cases referred to Committee on Privileges and Elections, covering all election cases since 1871.

1871. Reynolds v. Hamilton.
1871. Goldthwaite, of Alabama. Report by Stewart.
1871. Norwood v. Blodgett, of Georgia. Mr. Stewart reported.
1871. Ransome v. Abbott, of North Carolina. Reports by Logan and Carpenter.
1872. Pomeroy and Caldwell, of Kansas. Reports by Logan, Morton, and Thurman.
1872. Sykes v. Spencer, of Alabama. Reports by Carpenter and others.
1872. George v. Spencer, of Alabama. Reports by Carpenter and others.
1873 to 1880. Louisiana cases. Committee directed to inquire whether an existing legal State government in Louisiana and to look over credentials of McMillan and Ray. Reports by Carpenter and others.
1873. Bogy, of Missouri. Report by Morton.
1877. Corbin v. Butler, of South Carolina. Report by Cameron.
1877. Grover, of Oregon. Report by Wadleigh.
1879. Ingalls, of Kansas. Report by Salisbury.
1881. Lapham v. Miller, of New York. Report by Hill, of Georgia.
1886. Payne, of Ohio. Reports by Pugh and others.
1887. Lucas v. Faulkner, of West Virginia. Report by Hoar.
1890. Clark and Maginnis v. Sanders and Power, of Montana. Report by Hoar.
1890. Shoup and McConnell, of Idaho. Report by Hoar.
1890. Dubois, of Idaho. Report by Hoar.
1891. Claggett v. Dubois, of Idaho. Report by Mitchell.
1891. Call, of Florida.
1892. Davidson v. Call, of Florida. Report by Turpie.
1893. Roach, of North Dakota.
1893. Ady v. Martin, of Kansas.
1895. DU PONT, of Delaware. Report by Mitchell.
1897. Addicks v. Kenney, of Delaware.
1898. Hanna, of Ohio. Report by Chandler.
1899. Scott, of West Virginia. Report by McComas.
1899. Clark, of Montana. Report by Chandler.
1906. SMOOT, of Utah. Report by Burrows.
1911. LORIMER, of Illinois. Report by Burrows.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Now, I want simply to say, before action is taken, that it is my opinion, as it is the opinion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that if an investigation is ordered at this time it should be conducted along broad lines, that it should be deep, that it should be searching, that every possible fact that can shed any light on the circumstances attending the election of Senator LORIMER should be secured and presented to the Senate, and that evidence should receive from the committee that special consideration which will enable them to present a report to the Senate which will command its respect and which will command the respect of the people.

Did I not believe that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is composed of men of such character, ability, and honor that they would be able to do this I should hesitate to make this request. But knowing its membership as I do, knowing the Members of this body as I do, I believe that both the committee and the Senate are composed of men who can rise above any impressions derived from any previous consideration of this question to a new and independent consideration of the facts as they may be developed by further investigation.

For these reasons I hope that the case may be reopened, and that it may take the orderly course of procedure which has been ordained in this body.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the course which this debate has taken justifies me in saying a word before the vote is taken upon the resolution or before it is disposed of.

I presume if this had been an ordinary matter, coming up in the ordinary way, the usual resolution would have been introduced and have gone to the regular committee and been disposed of in the usual and regular manner. But, of course, we all recognize that it has not come up in the ordinary way or in the usual manner in which these matters arise.

We are confronted with the proposition that there has been one investigation and that the old Senate, if I may refer to it in that way, debated the matter extendedly and extensively and very earnestly, that both the committee and the Senate as a body were committed to certain ideas and preconceived opinions. Therefore it devolved upon those who initiated the proposition of a reinvestigation to outline, if practicable or possible, a mode of investigation which would lead, as nearly as could be done under the conditions of affairs as they exist here, to a hearing before a committee which was not bound either pro or con by reason of previous conviction.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from Idaho believe that there is a Senator in this body who, upon the evidence as it now stands, has not an opinion upon the case?

Mr. BORAH. I do not. I should not want to believe that, and I do not.

Mr. BAILEY. Then they are all disqualified.

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly that is true in one sense. But, Mr. President, that is one of the conditions which can not be avoided. There is no other body to pass upon this matter. But the matter of an investigation, of going and searching for evidence, the matter of inquiry, should certainly be conducted, if possible or practicable, by a committee which has no preconceived opinions as to the kind of testimony, the method of admitting testimony, or preconceived opinions as to witnesses or the standing of witnesses, if that can be done.

If this were the old Senate, I have no notion that the idea which is involved in this resolution would ever have been incorporated in a resolution.

But, Mr. President, I rose to say that it was this idea—whether it be a correct one or an incorrect one—which actuated those who were consulted in reference to this resolution, and certainly not any desire upon the part of some of them, at least—and I believe all—to reflect upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections or the Presiding Officer of this body.

We may have been in error as to the proper mode of proceeding. That is a matter for debate. But this was the reason for our proceeding in this way. I wanted to say before I cast my vote that I would not be a party to a willful or a purposeful reflection upon any member of that committee or the Presiding Officer of this body, and would not have consented to a resolution naming a special committee had it not been possible to incorporate in that committee new Members of the Senate, which seemed to me a perfect justification for the procedure.

I say furthermore, with some frankness, that it was with some difficulty that I arrived at a conclusion as to whether a reinvestigation ought to be made at all or not. I had supposed when the vote was taken in the previous session that the matter was ended. Indeed, I was convinced that it ought to end there. But after the investigation began at Springfield a new line of testimony was brought forward, and certainly, whether the evidence is conclusive or not, it all points in one direction and tends to prove one fact, and that is that the title to this seat is based upon corruption.

Certainly we must all admit that if those who are charged with having done so were going about in the city of Chicago to collect assessments to pay for seats here they were not doing so as a mere matter of pastime or as a joke. It must further appear conclusively to all that if there was anyone who was putting up money for the purpose of paying for a seat in this Chamber they were doing so because they expected an interest in the seat when it was purchased. And that kind of evidence, Mr. President, was so startling and of such import that it was new and distinctively new to the kind of evidence which had been gathered by the committee at its prior hearing.

In other words, this was not an election where parties, through their party zeal or party interest or personal loyalty, had gathered for the purpose of an election and through their zeal accomplished it by fair means or by foul. But it was an instance, if the evidence is to be believed in its import, where parties deliberately set about to purchase an interest in a seat in this Chamber. It sounds like the gabble of idiots to say that business men, who do not expend $10 without knowing where the return is to come from, would put $10,000 in the purchase of a seat in this Chamber unless they expected some return from that investment.

Such evidence necessitated a reconsideration, notwithstanding the fact that justice, as suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], might ordinarily require that there be an end of such matters at some time or other.

Furthermore, Mr. President, and this was another matter which would have some bearing upon this question, it must be conceded that the judgment as taken in this Chamber at the last session was unsatisfactory. By this I do not mean to imply who was right or who was wrong. But that the Senate of the United States should evenly divide or almost so upon a question not involving party alignments or party politics, but a simple question as to the integrity of a seat, was not only unsatisfactory to the country, but it was highly unsatisfactory to the Senate. It was in a large measure because there was a persistent rumor to the effect that there was evidence yet undiscovered, that the case as brought into this Senate Chamber was incomplete, that the investigation, whether with fault or without, was not conclusive; and the matter terminated not only with the practically even division of votes, but with the belief prevailing to a very large extent that the committee had been unable to procure all the evidence which was at hand.

Under such circumstances the investigation began at Springfield, and under such circumstances this new evidence, pointing to the source of supply for this corruption fund, was revealed, and then the only question to be presented was the manner of the reinvestigation. As I said a moment ago, those who offered the resolution did so because they believed that it was the nearest approach to a new jury for a new trial that could be had on the next investigation. We could not have a wholly new Senate, but we could have a wholly new investigating committee. It was our duty we felt to go as far in that direction as conditions would permit.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator from Idaho is not happy in describing the Senate as a jury. I hardly think he would make a motion for a new trial to the jury. He would go to the judge, and after the judge had granted his motion for a new trial, I hardly think the Senator from Idaho would ask him to recuse himself.

Mr. BORAH. I think that this practice would prevail, however: If I were seeking to have a rehearing before a body which is recognized in the court as a proper body to hear the evidence, I would want a body which had not passed upon the case, if I could get it. I might be answered by some friend who wanted the same jury which had decided in a certain way, "If the members of this jury are convinced they are wrong, they have sufficient manhood to change their opinion." But I would know, as every man knows, that you can not approach the mind which is once convinced and get the same equity and the same unprejudiced hearing and the same attention that you can when you approach the mind which has not yet been convinced, although one may be just as honorable and just as honest as the other.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I can understand how his objection would be well founded if the Senate is to be regarded as a jury, but I do not think that it is well founded if the Senate is to be regarded as a court. In all my experience at the bar I never thought it necessary to ask a judge to recuse himself after he had granted me a new trial upon the ground of new and material testimony. I have always rather thought the fact that he granted a new trial indicated that he believed that the testimony, if produced, would be decisive of the case.

Mr. BORAH. I will venture to suggest that if the Senator from Texas has had the experience that other lawyers have had, while he did not ask for a new judge he would have done so many times if it had been possible to get him.

Mr. BAILEY. I have been where I would ask for a new judge after he refused my motion for a new trial, but never where he granted it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator would not ask for it after he had refused the new trial, because his only remedy would be to appeal to another court, which remedy we have not in this case.

Mr. BAILEY. I would rather recall him under the modern practice.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Texas does not believe in that proposition. I am afraid he is not sincere in that statement.

Mr. BAILEY. I said under "the modern practice," not under mine.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it may be that this testimony which has been adduced at Springfield is not sufficient to reach conclusively to the title of the sitting member. It may, indeed, be true that some of the business men of Chicago, sitting around their clubs or social dives, talk about purchasing seats in this Chamber as a mere matter of intellectual recreation. Or it may be that their moral appetites have become so imbruited in the pursuit of their several lines of business that they find some pleasure and take some pride in boasting of crimes which they feel unfortunately they have never had an opportunity to commit. But, Mr. President, if some wealth-ridden financial accidents are going about in the high places and the business centers of Chicago talking about collecting assessments for the payment of seats in this Chamber, which, in fact, have not been purchased, still I would have this investigation proceed with the same rigidness and the same thoroughness, not only that the imputation might be removed from this body, but that such men might be branded before the world as common street liars.

It is almost as important to remove the imputation of slander from this Chamber as it is to remove the man who has purchased his seat. And there is only one way in which to do it, and that is to secure the presence of those who assert these things, whether they be true or not, and let them state before an inquiring body what reasons they had for making assertions of that kind.

I would not permit a man to talk in cold blood of purchasing seats in this Chamber, as if it were a market place or a stock exchange, and then seal his lips and close his books when the facts are wanted and the truth is demanded. Against the integrity of this body I would not permit, nor would the law permit, if it were properly applied, a man to plead his personal convenience or his personal affairs. Against the integrity of a coordinate branch of this Government the law is sufficient to gather all the facts, wherever they may be buried, and the law is sufficient, if necessary, to break the bank and jail the officers to enable a committee of this body to look into the contents of every book which would exonerate or condemn. It was for that purpose, Mr. President, without reflection upon those who had their preconceived opinions as to the law, that some thought it was necessary to have a new inquiring body, if it could be had.

I recall one instance, as an illustration, in the other investigation which, in my judgment, if it should be followed in this investigation, would lead precisely to the same result that it did in that. It was a matter of law, about which, I presume, the members of the committee would have the same conviction, and that was with reference to relieving Mr. Broderick from testifying before the committee. It was perfectly apparent upon the face of it why Mr. Broderick did not want to testify. It was perfectly apparent, as it was afterwards disclosed in his trial, that he proposed to prove what was, in effect, an alibi. To prove that when it was said that he went into the side room with Mr. Holstlaw, that he did not go there at all. Therefore he went upon the witness stand and told only a part of his story. He told it all until he got to the place where it was vital to his defense, and then, in violation of a well-established legal principle, he was permitted to close his lips. The result of it was that when he went to Springfield to put in his defense, he pulled out his satellites from his saloon and proved that Mr. Holstlaw was not in the side room with him at all; that he (Broderick) did not leave the presence of those who were at the bar, and did not pass into the side room where the money was paid.

For this reason, and others which might be cited, it was reasonable to conclude that a new committee would give a hearing upon legal propositions, and accept them more readily than one which had already taken a position in regard to them.

But, Mr. President, I can not dissociate this question and these matters from the larger question, and that is, What is to be the ultimate effect of such matters as this upon this body and upon representative government itself? It requires an optimistic turn of mind indeed not to see in the present condition of affairs a troubled future for these institutions which our fathers gave us. We have had contentions heretofore as extended as the broad domain of the Government itself. We have had a civil conflict largely to determine the meaning of the Constitution. But we have never before had in this country to any considerable extent disbelief in the theory and the framework of our institutions as such. It is now seriously charged and many good people believe that representative government is breaking down. It is believed that representatives are not always free to serve the public. It is believed by many that their sympathies are away from those whom they are supposed to serve. And hence there is a widespread and a widespreading sentiment in favor of having less and less of representative government.

Who can blame the masses for becoming dissatisfied with a system which gives us such State legislatures as are now most prominent in the public eye? Where the lawmakers of the great Commonwealths, lawyers and business men, seem to be actuated and guided and controlled in the discharge of their public duties by two motives, and only two, that of grand and petit larceny. Hence, public thought upon affairs of government are heading in two directions, both of them away from representative government. Upon the one hand there are those who seem to think that the solution of the question rests in a more bureaucratic form of government. A government with an autocrat in the shape of a bureau chief, responsible to no person and answerable to no people, to whom the President should yield obedience, and to whom the people should yield submission. A bureau which, through its worn-out and unbusinesslike system of red tape, may take up a matter with this generation and, if nothing unforeseen happens to delay it, conclude it with the succeeding generation.

Upon the other hand, there are those who would dispose, if possible, or so far as practicable, with the representative agency in government entirely, and would both enact and execute laws by popular vote. Both of these movements are manifestations of distrust of representative government. Both of them indicate a belief upon the part of the popular mind that there is a failure in representative government to do what the fathers believed it would do.

Mr. President, while we are dealing with these grave questions of changes in government, some of which are important and useful, let us not overlook doing the simple thing, the direct thing, the thing now at hand to be done, and that is to restore confidence in representative government as we now have it. Let us meet the responsibility that is now with us and discharge the obligation that is now upon us and cleanse representative government of corruption, and, what is equally important, cleanse it of the reputation and the imputation of corruption. It is up to this generation to rehabilitate representative government and restore confidence if we would preserve it.

Those who still cling to the old faith, who still believe that let come what may—the representative principle is essential and indispensable to free institutions—must set about to fit representative government for the conditions of modern affairs.

The first thing to do, Mr. President, is to proceed against corruption in high places in that rough and rugged and determined and uncompromising way which shows that we hate it and look upon it as a menace to our institutions, rather than a thing to be expected and ignored and compromised with and finally forgiven.

It is perfectly plain, Mr. President, that if we have not the power to cleanse representative government of corruption, then no form of popular government will long endure. It is perfectly plain that if we have not the power to separate those who have been brought in connection with the Government through corruption from the Government, that then what we need is not more popular government, but less. If such men as Wilson and Broderick and Browne, steeped in duplicity and corruption, can be nominated at a primary and reelected at a popular election, it is proof positive that the composite citizen needs some attention as well as the component parts of that ideal conception. The solemn injunction which rests upon everyone who believes in the principle of representative government is to restore confidence in the mind of the people that it is representative and not the partial advocate of special interests.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that this resolution as amended finally will pass. I should like to see the Senate—if I may make the suggestion—put aside for once the question of courtesy, the question of compromise, the question of precedent, the question of recognition of some one's sensitiveness, and proceed in this matter in such a determined and uncompromising way as to satisfy the great American public, whether the judgment be for or against Mr. LORIMER, that it is a correct and righteous judgment.

It was truly said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that the question of confidence and respect and the manner in which we proceed to investigate is almost equal in importance to the capacity of the investigating committee itself.

When we have concluded our work, when we have finished our investigation, when we have finally rendered another judgment, it is important that the public be convinced that the righteous and right thing has been done as well as to have the right and righteous thing done. We may disregard public opinion if we desire and as much as we choose, but the fact is that we live and have our usefulness and thrive as a Senate of the United States by reason of the respect and confidence of those who sent us here.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. CUMMINS, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin the resolution which I presented to the Senate on the 23d instant, and known as Senate resolution No. 51.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia offers as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin the following, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of Senate resolution 6 substitute the following:

Whereas the Senate adopted a resolution June 20, 1910, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the charges relating to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas since the Senate voted on the report of that committee it is represented that new material testimony has been discovered in reference to such matter; and

Whereas the Senate of the State of Illinois, on the 18th of May, 1911, adopted a resolution for the reasons therein stated, requesting the Senate of the United States to institute further investigation of the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate: It is therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, sitting in banc, be, and are hereby, authorized and directed forthwith to investigate whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices; that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate or of Congress; to hold sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; to employ stenographers, counsel, and accountants; to send for persons and papers; to administer oaths; and as early as practicable to report the results of its investigation, including all testimony taken by it; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee. The committee is further and specially instructed to inquiry fully into and report upon the alleged "jack-pot" fund in its relation to and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the Senator from Virginia claims the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will wait until I can take the floor in my own right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield the floor?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understood that the Senator from Wisconsin was of opinion that this matter could not be concluded this afternoon, and that he was going to make some suggestion in that regard. It is entirely immaterial to me. I am ready to go on, or I can wait.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not wish to take the Senator from Virginia from his feet.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I was not taken from my feet. I yielded to the Senator, understanding that he was going to make a suggestion of that sort.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator from Virginia yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With a view of making a motion, and I am about to make a motion, but I do not wish to make a motion to take the Senator from Virginia off the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understood the Senator wanted this matter to go over until Monday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am satisfied it will not be possible to conclude argument upon the resolution to-night. I know of other Senators who desire to speak, and I myself shall have something to say. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator from Virginia desires to speak now, to withhold a motion to adjourn. I wish to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am perfectly willing that a motion to adjourn shall be made, but I should like to have it understood that I will resume the floor when this matter is taken up on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in the hands of the Chair, and of course the Chair would recognize the mover of the substitute.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am perfectly willing, with that understanding, to yield the floor for to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 29, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 26, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by Rev. William Alexander Major, D. D., of Seattle, Wash., as follows:

O Lord, our God, Thou who art the Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in Thy being wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth, we look to Thee for all good. We are told that if a man lack wisdom, let him ask of God. We need Thy help, intelligence, instruction, discipline, growth.

Let Thy blessing fall upon these men who represent the greatest Government upon earth, help every man to be a good steward, faithful in the discharge of his duty, and may we all live and act so that what we do may commend itself to all the nations of the world.

We thank Thee for what Thou hast done for the individual. We bless Thee for his place in the world. We thank Thee for what Thou hast stamped upon him, and we come to-day to recognize that every act and perfect gift cometh from Thy hand. Lead us now in the deliberations of the day, strengthen us for every duty which awaits us, and not unto us, O God, not unto us, but unto Thy name give glory, for Thy mercy and Thy truth's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, May 23, 1911, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. McKENZIE, of Illinois, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 287. An act for the relief of James Henry Payne;

S. 288. An act to authorize the President to place Ensign John Tracey Edson on the retired list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant;

S. 307. An act to change the name of Fort Place, from Seventeenth to Eighteenth Streets NE., to Irving Street;

S. 274. An act providing for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia; and

S. 2055. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a new public building at Bangor, Me.; also for the sale of the site and ruins of the former post-office building.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 287. An act for the relief of James Henry Payne; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 288. An act to authorize the President to place Ensign John Tracey Edson on the retired list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 307. An act to change the name of Fort Place, from Seventeenth to Eighteenth Streets NE., to Irving Street; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 274. An act providing for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 2055. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a new public building at Bangor, Me.; also, for the sale of the site and ruins of the former post-office building; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia, for 10 days, beginning Monday, May 29, 1911, on account of important business.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH, for 14 days, on account of important business.

Mr. KENDALL, for two weeks, on account of important business.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, for two weeks, on account of illness in family.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BROUSSARD, desires 10 days leave of absence, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. BROUSSARD, on account of important business. Without objection, this request will be granted.

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—WILLIAM A. HARLAN.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. CANNON to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William A. Harlan, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOHN MITCHELL.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John Mitchell, in the Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill (H. R. 10508) to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies was changed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

When the Committee on Accounts was called,

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House joint resolution No. 75, reported favorably from the Committee on Accounts, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, by authority of the Committee on Accounts, calls up the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 75) reducing the number of Capitol police.

Resolved, etc., That the provisions in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation acts, approved June 7, 1910, and March 4, 1911, making appropriations for the Capitol police, are hereby amended by reducing the number of lieutenants from 3 to 2, by reducing the number of privates from 67 to 33, and by reducing the total appropriations for the Capitol police to such sums as may be necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this resolution should be on the Union Calendar and should be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I believe the rule is the same whether the purpose of the bill is to reduce expenditures or to increase expenditures. The purpose of this resolution is to discharge a certain number of employees and reduce the total of the appropriation. It is not a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, where the money is to be paid out of the contingent fund, and does not come within the rule the Chair has heretofore made, that privileged resolutions from the Committee on Accounts involving expenditures out of the contingent fund are properly upon the House Calendar and do not require consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this resolution is not considered as a privileged resolution at all.

Mr. MANN. I understand it is not a privileged resolution and does not come within the ruling of the Chair. This is a joint resolution to amend an appropriation bill affecting the expenditures and providing for a reduction in the appropriation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if the gentleman will object to asking unanimous consent to consider this resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would speak a little louder, inasmuch as it is a matter for the House to pass on.

Mr. MANN. I will not object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman from Illinois if he would object to a request for unanimous consent to consider this resolution in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and he said he would not object, and I suggest the gentleman from Georgia make that request.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, assuming if there is desired a little time for debate there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will state to the gentleman there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, this resolution completes, or is designed to complete, the caucus action of the majority on the 1st of April. On a previous day House resolution 128 was passed carrying into effect the recommendations of the caucus with the exception of the items carried by this resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I desire to ask whether there is to be general debate under a proceeding of this sort or whether the House does not at once proceed to the reading of the resolution and will offer it under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been read once.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand; but it seems to me we now proceed under the five-minute rule, and there is no general debate allowed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that on an interrogatory of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] promised there should be debate if they wanted any.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand that. I wanted to have the rule clearly understood. My impression is now that we are considering this resolution under the five-minute rule. Of course, we can consider it this way only by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The precedents show that there is no general debate when you are considering a resolution in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then I understand that it is by agreement that we are under general debate?

The SPEAKER. That is true. There is a kind of tentative agreement between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that if the gentleman from Illinois or anybody on that side wanted any time for debate they should have it. That was not put, however, as part of the motion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection at all to the discussion.

The SPEAKER. According to the rule you are pursuing debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think any difficulty in the matter can be obviated by any gentleman when he is recognized under the five-minute rule by asking for an extension of time, which will be granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] has the floor for the first five minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of my colleague on the committee from Georgia be extended for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] be extended 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not apprehend that there will be any necessity for my consuming 15 minutes to present the report of the committee to the House. In addition to the favorable report on this resolution by the committee, a committee report has been filed with the resolution. It goes into the history of the creation of the Capitol police force and is for the information of the House, but, on account of its length, I shall merely incorporate the report as a part of my remarks and the House may examine it if they desire. The Members of the House will readily perceive that the Capitol police force is a joint force, a composite force, and under the existing law one-half of the police force is chosen by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House. The caucus action and the report of the committee favor the abolition of 34 private policemen of the Capitol force and one lieutenant of Capitol police. And the joint resolution seeks to carry into effect this resolution by reducing the number of lieutenants from 3 to 2 and by reducing the number of privates from 67 to 33, which, if concurred in by the Senate, will give effective force to the action of the caucus and the recommendation of the Committee on Accounts, with a saving of approximately $36,000. And we submit this resolution for the purpose of executing this mandate of the caucus.

Unless there is some question that a Member of the House would like to ask, if it is permissible under the motion to extend the time for 15 minutes, I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to know whether the practice is now to have a lieutenant on duty all the time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am not able to answer the gentleman on that point. The rule seems to have been in the past to divide each 24 hours into 8-hour shifts, and under that theory three lieutenants might be necessary to make the systematic shifts of 8 hours each.

Mr. WEEKS. Necessarily, if the number of lieutenants were reduced, either the lieutenants would have to be on duty 12 hours each or else there would be one shift where there would not be an officer in charge of the force.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes, sir; if the captain did not take one of the shifts. The committee was not, however, able to see why the rule of an 8-hour shift should apply to a lieutenant with the same force that an 8-hour shift would apply to a private policeman, the duty of the policemen being of a character which might require an 8-hour shift, while that of the lieutenants is of another character—mainly supervisory—not requiring an 8-hour shift.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the gentleman think that it is desirable that the lieutenant shall remain on duty 12 hours?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman will excuse me; I could not quite understand what he said.

Mr. WEEKS. My question was whether the gentleman thinks it desirable for a lieutenant or any other man to remain on duty continuously for 12 hours?

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the captain serves 8 hours, there would be no interregnum or extra service to be performed by the lieutenants. But, speaking for myself, I think we might abolish the other two lieutenants and have a first-class captain and a reasonable police force and have no lieutenants at all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The committee, however, did not feel authorized to undertake to abolish all three of the lieutenants, as it was acting in accordance with the recommendation of the caucus. The caucus probably thought they would abolish one of them first, and that in due course they would attend to the other two.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not reserve his time under the five-minute rule. If the gentleman wants to take the floor again, nobody will object, but I do not want to see established the practice of reserving time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Speaker, I am not informed as to the number of police necessary properly to police the Capitol, although I have no doubt whatever that there are more men employed than are necessary, and to that extent I am in sympathy in the main with the apparent purpose of this resolution. But I am not in sympathy with the real purpose of the resolution, which is merely buncombe. If there are too many policemen in the Capitol, there is an easy way of dispensing with half of them, who are under the control of this House. The police in the Capitol are named by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the House, and they are divided equally between the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the House, and the Sergeant at Arms of the House can at any time discharge one-half of them, and the House can on any day pass a resolution directing the Sergeant at Arms of the House to dispense with the services of one-half of the Capitol police. But everybody who has gray matter in his brain—and everyone on that side and on this side, both, has gray matter in his brain—knows that when this resolution passes the House it is as dead as a last year's smelt.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Or any other smelt.

Mr. MANN. It would be a ridiculous attitude for the Senate to assume if they were to agree to the passage of this resolution, when they, without responsibility having changed, have just passed a law providing for this specific number of policemen.

The gentlemen on that side of the House who say there are too many police under the control of this body ought by resolution to require that the extra number be discharged. They have it within their power. If they have too many police, dispense with them. You gentlemen on that side are endeavoring to make political capital simply by pretending that you want to dispense with these policemen, when you know that you really propose to keep every one of them and when you will fill every vacancy that is created.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. I always yield with pleasure to my friend from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. I want to challenge the statement, Mr. Speaker, that we intend to keep them in office, and I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will support a resolution dispensing with one-half of the number?

Mr. MANN. I will; certainly. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But will you bring it in? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Have them bring it in now.

Mr. GARNER. We will give the Senate a chance first.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he will bring it in. I am willing to dispense with half of the police, because that is the only way there is to ascertain if we have too many. But I do not think the Capitol would run away if we had only one-quarter of the policemen that we have now. In fact, I believe the Capitol would be here when we returned from a vacation if we did not have any police at all.

Mr. FOCHT (from his seat). Is there going to be any vacation? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen desiring to participate in debate will rise and first secure recognition.

Mr. MANN. The question of the necessity of a vacation is such an admitted matter that I think it is perfectly natural for a Member to make an inquiry of that kind without rising from his seat. On that subject I refer the gentlemen on this side of the House to the gentlemen on that side of the House. [Laughter.]

I imagine that if we can keep the Weather Bureau in good order and the Chambers sufficiently hot at both ends of the Capitol, we may after awhile succeed in getting a vacation. Meanwhile, I hope the House will remain in session on those days when the new rule can operate which provides for the discharge of committees [applause on the Republican side], so that if we are obliged to stay in Washington we may be able to transact the business of the country, instead of merely loafing, as we are likely to for the next few days or few weeks. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman thinks it is very important to pass a joint resolution to pretend to want to discharge half of the police of the Capitol. We think it is more important to pass a law providing for pensions for the old soldiers. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, the gentleman from Illinois states that he thinks it is more important for the House to be in session and pass the pension bill that he speaks of. I ask the gentleman this question—I know that he is in a position to answer it—Why is it that the Republican Party in all the years that it was in power did not pass the bill the gentleman speaks of, and why did not the Republican Party pass that bill in the Sixty-first Congress?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, this House did pass that bill in the Sixty-first Congress. Will this House pass it in the Sixty-second Congress?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Let us do it, then. Let us not adjourn over the next committee-discharge day, and we can pass it quickly.

Mr. FINLEY. In the Sixty-first Congress was there not a Republican House, a Republican Senate, and a Republican President——

Mr. MANN. Yes; and there will be in the Sixty-third Congress also. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FINLEY. I think the gentleman is guessing as to the Sixty-third Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But when power was in the hands of the Republican Party that bill was not passed.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. FINLEY. And now the gentleman comes around and cries for the old soldier and complains that Congress does not pass this bill; yet his own party in the Sixty-first Congress absolutely refused to do the very thing that he now asks this House to do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Yes, Mr. Speaker; and there was one time before when a resolution passed Congress providing for the discharge of Capitol police, but it contained the provision when it passed that it should not be construed to require or permit the discharge of any old soldier who was on the roll of the Capitol police. No such provision is in this joint resolution. Not content with having this House pass over committee-discharge day, one of your great original ideas which you were in favor of until you could put it into effect, not content with that, you now propose to say that you would like to discharge the old soldiers on the Capitol police roll.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I am glad to see the interest manifested by the gentleman from Illinois on pension legislation, and——

Mr. MANN. I am mighty glad the gentleman is.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio (continuing). I would like to ask you a question. As you know, I have a motion on the calendar to discharge the committee from further consideration of H. R. 767, a bill to increase the pensions of old soldiers and their widows, and am anxious to have the motion considered, but suppose the House will adjourn, when it adjourns to-day, to next Tuesday, and the question is, under the rule, would my motion be in order next Monday? You understand next Monday will not be the first or third Monday, which days are motion-to-discharge-calendar Mondays.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's motion would be in order on the first Monday in June, if there were a session of the House, but as there will be no session of the House, under the leadership of the gentleman on that side of the House, on the first Monday in June the gentleman's motion will not be in order, because it can only be in order when the House is in session.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. It will be in order on the third Monday in June, will it not?

Mr. MANN. Well, I expect not. [Laughter.] I do not think it will be in session on either the first or the third Monday of any month before December, and I am not sure it will be even then.

Mr. SIMS. For which the gentleman from Illinois is duly thankful in his heart. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, along this same line I wish to have read in my time a very pathetic appeal which has been addressed to the Members of the House, or, at least, to the majority Members of the House, by a gentleman who has apparently been the statistician of the Democratic national committee, a member of the force of employees of the House, whose job has been legislated out of existence. In order that the pathetic appeal may live in history, I desire to have it read and placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an able effort; and if it does not bring tears to the eyes of gentlemen on that side of the House, and sympathy as well, they are a cold-blooded lot. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Has it brought tears to the eyes of the gentleman from Illinois? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE,
821 FIFTEENTH STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The caucus abolished the position of pair clerk. Both Mr. PALMER and Mr. HULL say they had no idea that this would abolish me, yet it has so worked. My place dies on May 15, as per resolution adopted Tuesday. Is this just to an employee who has always been at his post? Is it fair? Is it just to injure a faithful employee under the shibboleth of economy? Did a single man who voted to abolish the pair clerk's place have in his mind when so doing that it abolished me? More than 100 Members have told me that they never dreamed that my position was imperiled. Yet events have so twisted about that the full weight of the blow falls on my shoulders. Does economy outweigh the demands of justice?

I call every Member of the House to witness that I have always stood to my post and done valiant service for a much less compensation than the service warranted. I never complained at the pay and never asked for a better place, although I had a right so to do. I simply asked to be retained where I was, and common justice will move every man of you to say that I ought to have been retained.

You won a great victory in 1910. Was I not a contributor in 1909 to that victory, when, as clerk to the minority of the Ways and Means, I gave the party figures which were used on the floor of the House and on every stump in the country? Was I not a real contributor in 1910, when, as statistician for your committee, I furnished facts, figures, information, and arguments, which were used as weapons to strike a common enemy to the ground? Flushed and elate with victory, is it fair or just to me not only not to advance me but with fell hand to strike down the modest position I hold?

When a common defeat comes I am as ready to wear the willow unmurmuringly as any man living; but when a common victory, one to which I contributed a full share, without regard to section or district, comes to our banner I have a just right to the laurels, especially when my ambition leaps no higher than my old $1,800 place. Having shared the dangers, it is not too much to ask a very small share of the honors. I have stood in no man's way nor coveted any man's place. I was satisfied where I was, and a great party can hardly afford to punish its honest workers by abolishing their positions. My place was not a sinecure, and besides filling it well I did work for the entire Congress which should have made my place immune from attack on any ground. Believing that a wrong has been done by Democrats without in the least intending it, I write this letter to each of the 226 victors with the hope that they will with pleasure and unanimity undo the wrong they have so unconsciously done a vigorous, enthusiastic, and vigilant member of their force. As the matter now stands, the Republicans have two pair clerks and the Democrats one. Is a Democrat's place so absolutely useless as to be abolished, while Republican places are impregnable?

I appeal to you, one and all, for an immediate reinstatement of my place, so that my opportunity for helpfulness in a common cause may not be ruthlessly destroyed.

As ever, your friend and coworker, JOSIAH H. SHINN.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that sounds like the plea of a lost soul. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. In view of the sympathy expressed by the gentleman from Illinois for Mr. Shinn—and I share in that sympathy—I have no sympathy for the employee by the name of Joseph Weir. Therefore I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will agree to a resolution to dispense with the services of Mr. Weir and substitute Mr. Shinn in his place?

Mr. MANN. I do not know Mr. Weir, and neither do I know Mr. Shinn. I do not know what jurisdiction I have over a resolution in reference to employees.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman is the leader of the minority.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire that Mr. Shinn should be put in as a minority employee?

Mr. CLAYTON. I thought the sympathy the gentleman from Illinois expressed for him would lead him to put him in that place. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to see if we can not reach a common point of agreement about this matter. I think the gentleman, Mr. Shinn, was unjustly turned out, and the gentleman from Illinois thinks so, too. So we agree. The majority of the House, it seems, has but one pair clerk and the minority has two; so I think the fair and right thing, in view of the valuable service that Mr. Shinn has rendered, would be to dispense with the new man by the name of Weir and put Mr. Shinn in. What I desire to get at is an expression from the gentleman from Illinois, as minority leader, to see if he would agree with me in that; and then, if he will, I will devote myself to framing a proper resolution having that end in view.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the inquiry is a fair one. The gentleman, Mr. Weir, is, I believe, one of the minority pair clerks and a very efficient one, one that we have need for and use. The reasons given by the gentleman, Mr. Shinn, whose letter was read, for being employed by the House, is that he has been of great assistance and furnished the brains for the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee in the last Congress and very largely for the Democratic national committee. That may be a very good reason for his applying for the place in the House, although it does not appeal to me, but certainly it is not a very good reason for his being employed as a Republican minority employee of the House. [Laughter.] Perhaps he could change his party as rapidly as he could his position, but I do him the credit to say that I believe he was sincere and is a sincere man, who did good service in the House while he was employed under a Republican House. Whether he be reemployed or not, shortly some one else will be named by the Democratic House to fill his position, in order to properly take care of the work of the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, the debate has taken a range entirely foreign to the resolution, and I desire to call the attention of the House to one subject to which we did not allude.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he has no right to address the House again until everybody who wishes has spoken under the rule.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I understood that I reserved the remainder of the 15 minutes' time.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty about that is that one can not in Committee of the Whole or in the House when the House is proceeding as in Committee of the Whole reserve time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, merely for this purpose do I rise: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] called the attention of the House to a fact, or made a statement, that may be true, and that is that this joint resolution undertaking to abolish 34 private Capitol police and 1 lieutenant may never get any further toward actual passage than this end of the Capitol. The gentleman may be correct. However, it is the opinion of the majority—certainly of the Committee on Accounts—that before the House by simple resolution, or before the Sergeant at Arms of the House should assert or exercise the authority, if he has it, of his own will, to dismiss certain of the Capitol police force, this end of the legislative machinery should first pass by appropriate legislation, in the shape of a joint resolution, a proposition providing for a reduction of the number of the Capitol police force, with the concurrence of the Senate, inasmuch as the Capitol police force has always been a composite body. There has heretofore been no House police force and no Senate police force, but a Capitol police force, and so provided by existing law. Speaking for myself, and I believe for the committee, we will not controvert the proposition that the House by simple resolution could abolish 34 police by instructing the Sergeant at Arms not to appoint his quota—to wit, 34—but in that event we would have a police force of 34 which would be all nominated and selected by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. Before that course, as a matter of economy, is resorted to, we think we are clearly within the purposes of the action of the caucus in submitting to the House a joint resolution and transmitting it to the Senate. It is a breach of no confidence that there is already a report on file upon the minutes of the Committee on Accounts recommending that if this resolution should meet with disaster at the hands of the Republican majority in the other end of the Capitol, we then forthwith report a resolution dismissing one-half of the police employed in the House end of the Capitol, which will give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] one chance to vote for genuine and speedy economy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am not anxious to have unnecessary employees, our friends the Democrats being in the majority, and I was never anxious to have unnecessary employees when the Republicans were in the majority. I had never thought that the employees about the Capitol, especially the Capitol police, in connection with the grounds and Capitol, were too many. You gentlemen are responsible—discharge them all if you choose, or discharge a part of them if you choose—do your part of the legislating if you choose. Unfortunately, however, you may be blocked, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, by an unwilling Senate, because, after all, under the Constitution of the United States the Senate has to unite before legislation can be enacted. I have sometimes thought that this touching of the employees of the House and Senate was uncomfortable, because for many years, as I recollect, the employees in the Senate, a body numbering 92 Members, have been and are in excess of the employees of the House, a body numbering 391 Members. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I have assisted in tearing passion to tatters in denouncing that situation. If gentlemen doubt the correctness of my statement, let them just inquire and see the number of secretaries and the number of committees and committee clerks and the number of messengers and the number of janitors that the coordinate branch of the Government, called the Senate, has. After all, for 20 years this claim has been made, that either they have far too many or we too few. I expect there is a happy medium. Did any of you gentlemen ever make a vote out in Texas or anywhere else by holding up to public notice the extravagance of the Senate? Oh, no. But, Mr. Speaker, it is a nice diversion. Now, what we ought to have in this Capitol is enough employees to care for the Capitol and to care for the grounds.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, one would infer from the gentleman's remarks that because the Senate had an excess of employees over the number employed in the House that the House ought to continue the present number——

Mr. CANNON. Oh——

Mr. GARNER. Just one moment. Surely the gentleman does not contend that if it is shown that the employees in the House are unnecessary they ought to be retained?

Mr. CANNON. Why, absolutely not; but I wanted to show that you are, as I believe you are, masquerading before the country watching the drippings that drop here and drop there from the spigot; a little later on you will waste at the bung.

Why, discharge them all, if you want to do so. I can get along; but with the people coming to the Capitol, from the 90,000,000 of them, with all kinds of people, I do not know—I never was afraid of being assassinated when I was Speaker of the House, the present occupant of the Chair is not afraid of being assassinated, but unless they have forgotten their cunning the letters are many that the Speaker is receiving that his days are numbered, and for you to make your peace with God, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter and applause.] That is unavoidable. Once in awhile there comes a real crank or criminal, yet I never lost any sleep on that account or had a guard. If it was foreordained from the beginning that the Speaker of the House should be assassinated, nothing would stop it; yet there come into the galleries in the main many people, and once in awhile a crank or an insane man will possibly get in.

So much for that. Now, I am making no argument to affect your action in the premises, and having said that much about it, I might add that I have a room. We all have rooms. I think I am responsible more than any man living for the two Office Buildings. I had the honor and pleasure, along the line of the public service, by unanimous consent, of putting the provision in the sundry civil bill when I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations authorizing the two Office Buildings. There has been much of criticism about it, but I think no man criticizes now. Up to this time, however——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have a few minutes more if I may—5 or 10 minutes—I do not think I shall use 10 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes additional.

Mr. CANNON. I think I will not take 10 minutes——

Mr. GARNER. I ask that the gentleman may be granted 10 minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes additional.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have been treated with great courtesy always as a Member of this House and have tried to treat others with courtesy. Now, I expect you have too many janitors, but I do not know; there is none for my room. [Laughter.] I can get along without a janitor or without anybody to sit at the door of the room and wait. After all, in a Government, the greatest on earth, that expends $900,000,000 a year for the public service, and we make the appropriations and do the legislating, the query I want to suggest is, Had not we better seek to go to larger things than to deprive ourselves of the ordinary assistance for the performing of our duties because we have great responsibilities? That is all. I will get along and I guess you will get along. So much for that. Now a word touching the discharge of committees. Something has been said about it.

The rule being in the rules, and there being a calendar of that kind, it had just as well not be there unless we use it; but I find that the majority, after a caucus, as I understand it, say that we shall not use it. Well, all I want is for the country to understand, because I believe in the rule of the majority. This is a Government of the people through a majority, the majority being responsible. You might just as well not have adopted the rule unless you are going to use it. Are you afraid to use it? Will it embarrass somebody? I fancy so. Let me go a little bit into some of the happenings. I have in my mind's eye some Members in the Sixty-first Congress on the minority side. I have some letters written by some of those Members—I will not mention their names unless they want me to do so [laughter]—to their constituents informing them that the pension legislation for the veterans of the Civil War—a dollar a day—could not be considered by the House because an autocratic czar—the Speaker—had so decreed.

There is no autocratic czar now in the Speaker's chair. You have nearly 65 majority in the House. Oh, my dear friends from Ohio, how you came over into Illinois demanding a dollar-a-day pension, and how I was grilled because, as an autocratic Speaker, I put my autocratic foot upon that legislation. And, say, I have some of you in my mind's eye, and some of you in my eye right now. [Laughter and applause.] And now the query is, What are you going to do? Were you deceiving the people then, or are you going back upon your promise now?

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. The gentleman mentioned some Members, particularly from Ohio. I hope he does not refer to the gentleman from the thirteenth district.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman very particularly interested at this day on account of his desire to get up the pension bill and let it become a law?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will receive a full, frank, earnest, and truthful reply. Recognition was given on suspension day in the last session of Congress to move to suspend the rules and pass what was known as the "Sulloway bill." I never demagogued in my life touching pension legislation, and I believe I have not demagogued touching any legislation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CANNON. I want to answer this first, but a little later I will yield. Oh, the gentleman said we had a Republican Senate, and they did not pass it. We passed it here, and I, for the second time while I was Speaker during eight years, took five minutes to advocate that legislation, and it passed by a two-thirds vote through the House. Everybody understands that the Senate has no cloture, no previous question, and it could not be reached and was not reached. I want to put it up to the Senate. You say that it is a Republican Senate, but it does not seem to be able to elect Senator GALLINGER President pro tempore of the Senate. But if it is a Republican Senate, let us put up this legislation to it. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I appeal to the Ohio Members. I appeal to the Indiana Members that tore passion to tatters with speeches along this line. Gentlemen, I do not say that you intended to deceive, but I will say that you intended to deceive unless you call another Democratic caucus and rescind that resolution that I understood you adopted, to the effect that there should be no pension legislation at this session.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to correct the gentleman's impression.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I want to correct the gentleman's impression as to what the Democratic caucus did, if I may. You understand as well as I do that the program did not consider pension legislation; but I understood we would be called together several times, and at the next caucus I expected to ask for pension legislation. There was no statement made at the caucus that we would not have pension legislation at the special session, and my candid opinion is that we will have pension legislation at this session of Congress, at least I expect to do everything I can to get legislation that will do justice to the old soldier and his widow.

Mr. CANNON. That is all right. If you are going to do it, then my remarks do not amount to anything. It reminds me of a boy that I once met when I was in a campaign. I stayed a night with a farmer. He had a beautiful farm, and we were looking over it the next morning, and finally I said to him, "I have got a farm down in Vermilion County; come down and see me and we will go out and look it over; bring this boy and bring the wife." And I said, "I have got a pony that I will give to this boy." The boy began to pull at the father's coat-tail. Finally the father said to him, "What is it, Chan?" The boy replied, "Father, ask the gentleman when." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The gentleman was appealing a moment ago to the Indiana delegation in regard to the pension question. I want to put this inquiry to the gentleman, if he will permit, Whether or not he thinks his own party in Indiana was trying to deceive the people when it, in State convention, solemnly declared for a dollar-a-day pension bill?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, my party, I think, was in good faith. I know I am in good faith, and I know that the Republican House of Representatives of the Sixty-first Congress was in good faith. But all this is "leather and prunella." You have got your 65 majority. Are you going to perform? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. Do it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. When? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, that is all I desire to say. You are entitled to time for consideration. That is all right, but——

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CANNON. With great pleasure.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wanted very respectfully to ask my good friend from Illinois a question, being on the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure; all right.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have a pleasant recollection now of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois placed me upon that committee in the Sixtieth Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. As a member of that committee I want to say now that I personally am in favor of pension legislation as early as possible at this session of Congress, if practical, or as soon as it can be had, so that it is not with a view of opposing legislation at this session that I ask this question.

Mr. CANNON. But I will say to the gentleman, before he asks his question, "Next!" [Laughter on the Republican side.] Is there anybody else who wants to be excused on that side? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUSSELL. My friend from Illinois seems to desire to make the impression that the Democratic Congress is opposed to pension legislation.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will ask him to state if it is not a fact that in the Sixty-first Congress there was an extra session at which there was no effort made to enact pension legislation?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I think so.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. May I have a minute more?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for another minute. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there has ever been a pension bill passed or even considered by a Republican Congress at an extra session?

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect. But you are the reformers. You have come in with all kinds of pledges, and you have promised that you were going to be better than we Republicans were. It makes no difference whether it is an extra or special session or not. If we failed in our duty at a special session, is that any reason why you should fail in your duty?

Mr. RUSSELL. We are not going to fail in our duty. If a bill is not passed at this session, as I am personally in favor of having it passed, we propose to pass it at the regular session, when we will still have a majority of this House.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman from Illinois think the passage of a pension bill that will increase the expenses of the Government $50,000,000 a year a reform measure?

Mr. CANNON. I believe in it from the standpoint of public policy. As we rely upon the citizen soldiery for the defense of the great Republic of 90,000,000 of people for the future, I believe it is good policy. I am old enough to know what those men passed through in that great struggle, and I would pass the bill. If you gentlemen will stop tinkering with the revenue laws, I believe we shall have enough money to pay the expense. But if you keep on tinkering, I would still pass the bill, and, if necessary, to discharge this great obligation I would borrow the money. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the Republican President who called this session included the pension legislation in his call or recommended it?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, as to Oklahoma, God knows what that Oklahoma constitution does provide; I do not. There is the initiative and the referendum. I do not know precisely whether the gentleman's State has the recall, but I know that down there there are all kinds of chances to legislate. It may be that that constitution of Oklahoma prohibits a legislature called in special session from considering anything not included in the call; but we are operating under the Constitution of the United States, and the President did not put anything in his message touching the free-trade tariff bill, or a revision of Schedule K, or the cotton schedule. Under our Constitution we have plenary power to cover the whole legislative field. I trust I have given my friend from Oklahoma something of information touching the United States. We are not governed by the constitution of Oklahoma. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, during the last session of Congress it was rumored that the President would veto the Sulloway bill, a bill drafted along the same lines as my bill. Now, I should like to know if the gentleman from Illinois is aware of the fact, or if it is a fact, that the President will sign the bill, providing the Democratic Party passes it, as I think they will?

Mr. CANNON. Let me say to my friend the President is President. So far as the veto power is concerned and his power to communicate with Congress with recommendations for legislation, the gentleman is as familiar with it as I am. I will perform my duty here and the President can perform his duty there. He has not directed my action, and can not. I have not directed his action, and can not. God forbid that we should ever race along the lines where one coordinate branch of this Government interferes with another. [Applause.]

Now, as to whether he would have vetoed it or not, I do not know. He never asked me, and we never talked along that line. The newspapers say that he never said he would veto it. I will vote with you to pass it and send it to him, and then I believe he will perform his duty as God gives him to see the right. [Applause.] I think it is right to pass the legislation. Now, that is all I have to say.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have been referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that my reference was not at all personal.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The gentleman was looking right at me, and I supposed he referred to me.

Mr. CANNON. I referred to the gentleman as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I greatly admire the gentleman's newborn zeal for the old soldier.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it is not new born.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It was born in the November election of 1910. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am the author of the dollar-a-day pension bill, introduced in this House in December, 1907, and reintroduced in the next Congress. I never was able to get a vote, even, in the Invalid Pensions Committee of the House, controlled by the Republican Party. They would not even give me a vote on the question.

On the 26th of February, 1908, I made a speech on the floor of this House in favor of the dollar-a-day pension bill and exhibited at that time the greatest array of petitions in favor of that bill that were ever seen on the floor of this House; and while I was delivering that speech the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] called attention to the fact that the Republicans on that side of the House, with the exception of only six, had left the Hall. I want to show by the RECORD how much the gentleman from Illinois was in favor of the dollar-a-day pension bill when he was Speaker of this House.

On April 24, 1910, Representative Charles Weisse, of Wisconsin, a member of the Invalid Pensions Committee, well known to all the Members of this House, came into my office, No. 175 House Office Building, and in the presence of two witnesses made this statement:

> You can quote me as saying, Chairman SULLOWAY told me that he would not allow the Sherwood dollar-a-day bill to come out of the committee, as Mr. CANNON and the administration would not stand for it; that they would prevent a vote by keeping enough members of the committee away from each meeting to prevent a quorum.

This was on April 24, 1910.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Let me get through with my remarks. I did not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Just upon that point. The gentleman there quotes a double hearsay and brings it as evidence, and I, looking in his eye, tell him there is not a word of truth in it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. You were Speaker of this House and absolutely in control. You had a Republican committee. Why did you not report the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I was not a member of that committee then and am not now. You are its chairman. Why do you not report the bill? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. The dollar-a-day pension bill has been considered and approved. It was adopted as the platform of the Democratic Party of Ohio. The Republican Party of Ohio in convention assembled denounced that as demagoguery. Gov. Harmon was elected governor of Ohio by 100,000 majority and over on that bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have prepared a bill and the committee has agreed to a bill and at a future day it will report a bill which will be passed by this Congress, and you will vote for it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The reason it has not been reported is that we have not had a chance to report it. It seems to me it is an exhibition of remarkable amount of gall for a man who has been Speaker of the House of Representatives during all this time, who would not allow a pension bill to come out of a committee for over four years, to complain that no bill has been reported at an extra session when no bill has ever been passed at an extra session. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to call attention to the fact and ask the gentleman how long the Senate committee had the Sulloway bill before it reported it? The bill was passed by the House on the 10th of January, and the Senate held it for 53 days in committee, clearly intending to smother it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire a further extension of time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHERLEY. I demand the regular order.

Mr. CANNON. That is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word, and that is the regular order.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Illinois will have to speak to the matter before the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky was not in the Hall of the House when we commenced this afternoon, I understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. That statement is true. I was not here when the House met, but I was here very shortly after.

Mr. MANN. This is a resolution that should have been considered in Committee of the Whole, and I think there was no intention of being strict about the rules of debate. I simply want to call that to the gentleman's attention.

Mr. SHERLEY. I merely exercised my right in demanding the regular order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the right; but I want to say that if that right be exercised freely on that side of the House, the same right will be exercised on this side of the House. The other day the gentleman from Kentucky got 15 minutes by consent of the House to speak on a question that was not before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I believe this House ought to be properly equipped by appropriations providing for officials that will enable the House to properly legislate for the consideration of the House. There is much of important legislation that the country expects will be considered and hopes that it may be enacted. This is a large country, with larger revenues than any country on earth and larger expenditures than any country on earth. It requires much of diligence and much of industry. I especially desire to call attention to the great number of important bills touching interstate and foreign commerce that have been referred to the proper committee. There has been much of criticism heretofore touching legislation that was referred to that committee that was promised to be considered if there should be a change in the complexion of the House. I say that also with regard to many other important measures and important committees—the Ways and Means Committee, for instance. So it is with another important committee. Much of criticism for alleged failure to enact proper pension legislation has been had.

I will not stop to discuss—and perchance under a strict construction it might not be in order—the merits of that criticism, but I do desire to say, without discussing it, without excusing or without accusing, the House should be properly equipped with vigilant committees to consider this important business before the Ways and Means Committee, before the Appropriations Committee, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and before the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The country does not care three whoops about what legislation has not been enacted; it is a question of what shall be enacted. The chairmen of these great committees can not excuse themselves from failure to report proposed legislation that will enable the House to consider the same. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have been strictly in order. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the provisions in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation acts, approved June 17, 1910, and March 4, 1911, making appropriations for the Capitol police, are hereby amended by reducing the number of lieutenants from 3 to 2, by reducing the number of privates from 67 to 33, and by reducing the total appropriations for the Capitol police to such sums as may be necessary.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Strike out the period at the end of line 10 and insert in lieu thereof a comma and add the following:
> "Provided, That in carrying out the provisions of this resolution preference in the matter of reduction of said force shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and of the War with Spain."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make only a few remarks in support of this amendment. This debate has taken a wider range perhaps than the rules strictly construed would permit, and inasmuch as that has occurred I shall venture to say a few words which will not relate directly to the merits of the amendment. I want to say in answer to the statement made by some gentleman that the President of the United States might have vetoed the Sulloway bill if it had passed the Senate, that in my judgment he would not have done so. Furthermore, no Republican President ever did veto a pension bill, public or private, and no Republican President, in my judgment, ever will veto a pension bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have heard President Taft on more than one occasion utter the most friendly and patriotic sentiments in favor of liberal pension legislation, and I do not think I violate any confidence when I say that only yesterday the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, and myself had a talk with him, in which he expressed his earnest desire for liberal pension legislation for the relief of soldiers who have jeopardized their lives or their health in the service of this country. And I say to you, gentlemen, that he is the soldier's friend, and will approve any reasonable pension bill that comes to him.

As a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I want to say that I am anxious to see a more liberal pension law enacted, and I am doing all I can to that end, and I believe my colleagues on the committee are also. I hope it will be done at this extra session. I think such legislation has already been too long delayed. I shall not stop to say whether or not my own party has been derelict in that respect, but let me say to gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that if they will take up and pass such a bill I, as a Republican, will heartily support it even if it is a Democratic measure, and I will give you your full share of the credit for aiding in the enactment of such a law. I want to see the law passed while the old boys are still living to enjoy it, I care not who gets the credit.

With reference to this amendment, I do not know whether I am personally acquainted with a single member of this Capitol police force or not, but I have no doubt there are some ex-soldiers of the Civil War and some ex-soldiers of the Spanish War among them, and if such there be I want to see them given this preference in the matter of retention which the general law now gives to the soldier employees of the Government in the classified branches of the service. I hope the amendment will prevail. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, as far as the Committee on Accounts is concerned, if I understand the amendment as it was read, we have no objection to its being adopted. Therefore I ask to have the amendment read that we may fully understand what it is.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia, if he has the information, or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], as to how many new men have been appointed, or how many men have been appointed anew, on the police force since the officers of the House were elected—named by the Sergeant at Arms of the House?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, nearly all of the 17 that would remain on the House side have been named. Some of them have been actually appointed. Others have not yet been appointed.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, there have been a number of policemen appointed through the Sergeant at Arms of the House since the present Sergeant at Arms was elected.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I should have supposed if there were vacancies they would leave them vacant, if there is really no use for the policemen.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, we have not filled any vacancies. We have simply made vacancies and filled those with Democrats.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman has filled vacancies because he has made vacancies. He could have made vacancies and left the vacancies unfilled; and if there is no need for the policemen, why in the world does he not make the vacancies and leave them for the present? If you do not need the men, why should you have them and waste public money paying them?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the 17 remaining places will be filled by Democrats. The patronage committee, or the organization committee, if I may so call it, which is a caucus committee of the Democratic Party, have no power to dismiss anybody. They have followed as strictly as they knew how the suggestions of the Democratic caucus, and that Democratic caucus said that 17 policemen should be had, and we expect to have 17 policemen appointed.

Mr. MANN. Then, as I understand it, the gentleman proposes to name 17 Democrats for useless places that are not needed, it being stated that there is no occasion for these policemen, in the opinion of the other side of the aisle—no demand for them; no need for them. They still propose to appoint 17 men to those places at a salary of $1,100 a year—a gross waste of the money if gentlemen are correct. Now——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The useless places are held by Republicans, who will be discharged——

Mr. MANN. Ah, the gentleman says——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I was going to say the 17 useless places are now held by Republicans, who will be discharged when this resolution goes into effect.

Mr. MANN. Ah, but this resolution says there are 34 useless places. Do I understand my colleague from Illinois to say that a place is useless unless it is to be filled by a Democrat, and if it is to be filled by a Democrat, then it is useful? I can understand that these places are useful to gentlemen on the committee on patronage—is the gentleman on the committee on patronage? Yes; and my colleague thinks the places are useful because they are obliged to find places in order to satisfy the cormorant demands of that side of the House——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. And they say in one breath they have no need for them and in the next they say that they do need the places, and hence it is proposed to appoint men to the job.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself to the amendment for just a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, the provision contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky extends a preference to the soldiers of the Civil War and the Spanish War, and the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, from whose action I can not dissent, has expressed the view that that committee will accept the amendment, but before the House votes upon it I desire to suggest that the expressed preference now designed by the amendment in favor of the Civil War veterans comes at a late hour from that side of the House, when for 16 years, and since the Spanish War, you have been filling those places, and your resolutions made no such provision for the Civil War veterans. [Applause on the Democratic side.] More than that, I would ask you now why in 1898, when 18 of these Capitol police were put on under the exigencies of the Spanish-American War and the places were filled, you did not give them to old soldiers, and why old soldiers do not fill them now?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when the Republicans are administering the law it does not require a resolution for them to keep soldiers on the roll. They do it anyhow. [Applause on the Republican side.] Some of them were appointed, I am told, on this police force when the Republicans had control of it. Let me call the gentleman's attention also to the fact that the Republicans have enacted into the statute law of the country provisions giving preference in all branches of the public service to the ex-soldiers and ex-sailors of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am glad of the gentleman's statement. If they pursued that policy, then go to the Post Office Department, go to the War Department, go, if you please, into the Treasury Department and see sitting at the desks there, standing at the doors, and filling the places able-bodied, sleek-faced, strong Africans holding easy jobs which old, enfeebled veterans deserve. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why give to these old, feeble men who fought 50 years ago the arduous task of night police duty and day police duty? Why do you not give them some of these sitting-down jobs? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Speaking as a son of the South, with no lineage that connects me with those who led the Union side 50 years ago, the day is not now and never has been south of Mason and Dixon's line when Afric's son could displace a Caucasian in any office under any Democratic appointment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can no longer deceive the old soldiers or American people with your cunning demagoguery in order to control the southern vote in your Republican conventions.

We had accepted the amendment; and we would have carried out the purposes anyway, if it had never been in the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended House joint resolution.

The joint resolution was engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer from the Committee on Accounts the following privileged resolution, with certain committee amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to be adopted:

House resolution 173 (H. Rept. 40).

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the committee appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted May 16, 1911, to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether there have occurred violations by the United States Steel Corporation or other corporations or persons of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the acts supplementary thereto, the various interstate-commerce acts and the acts relative to the national-banking associations, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, after the word "associations," insert "to an amount not exceeding $25,000."

In line 12 strike out the words "approved by the chairman of said committee" and insert "ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] is recognized.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution as presented is in the usual form. Though there are numerous forms that have been used in the past, I think the one that is generally adopted is the form in which this resolution is presented. The Committee on Accounts believed that it was wise, inasmuch as we were beginning a new policy, and a policy for ourselves, that the expenditures should be limited. We therefore provide by an amendment that the expenditures shall not exceed $25,000. Now, I want to say, however, that so far as the Committee on Accounts is concerned, we have no disposition to limit any reasonable expenditure of that important special committee. If it is necessary to expend more money, there will be no hesitancy on the part of the Committee on Accounts to bring in a resolution asking for a greater authorization. In addition to that, we believed that it was wise policy to provide that the accounts as they may accrue, that the expenditures that are made by the committee, should be authorized by the committee itself, and that the Accounts Committee, which is charged with the watching and controlling of the contingent fund, should also have some control of the expenditures of that committee. So that these amendments provide that any expenditures that are made shall be authorized by both the special committee and the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LLOYD. I will.

Mr. MANN. I notice the limitation in the first instance is $25,000. I think the amendments, I will say to the gentleman, which the committee has proposed make a very good guard for the resolution in order to safeguard it properly. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is anticipated that this committee is likely to expend any such sum as $25,000? You authorize this for the sugar investigating committee, and if newspaper reports are true innumerable requests will be made for other committees. Of course, I do not know how many are likely to be appointed, but are these committees likely to expend such a sum as $25,000?

Mr. LLOYD. I am assured by the chairman, Mr. Speaker, that the committee, so far as it now has information, thinks it will not spend as much as $10,000 in this investigation, but no one can tell at this juncture what will be the expenditure; and I suppose that, so far as every Member of this House is concerned, if more money is needed that they may have it, in order to hold a complete and thorough investigation of the matters referred to the committee.

Mr. MANN. I certainly have no objection to letting them have a proper amount, and I feel very confident that the gentleman from Kentucky, who now rises, will not be unduly extravagant. I have no idea that that is in his mind; but, as I said before, I would like to make an inquiry as to what is the probable amount of expense connected with this investigation.

Mr. STANLEY. I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is impossible at this time to tell what will be the necessary expenses connected with this investigation, because we can not tell at this time the full scope of the inquiry. We propose to make a careful and diligent and thorough investigation, as outlined in the resolution. It might occur that in making that investigation the services of experts and other items of expense would be found necessary. For instance, if the United States Steel Corporation should be unwilling or reluctant to give us the facts to which we think we are entitled, or if we should not be satisfied with their report and should require the services of expert accountants and people of that kind to ascertain the data that we might think necessary in such an investigation as would be satisfactory to the American people, some considerable expense might be entailed. But, as at present outlined, I do not believe this investigation will be expensive.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield, I will say that I was chairman of an investigating committee of this House that carried on a rather prolonged investigation as to wood pulp and paper and took thousands of pages of testimony—an investigation that went very carefully into the accounts of a great many manufacturing concerns—and my recollection is that the entire expense of that investigation was less than $5,000. I am inclined to think it did not exceed one-half of that.

Mr. STANLEY. It may be that this investigation will not exceed one-half of that. This resolution does not provide that the $25,000 must be expended.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. STANLEY. The business of the United States Steel Corporation is an epitome of the industry of this whole country. It is interwoven with the railroads and banks and cement companies and with contracts with and for the Government. It entails an investigation into a multiplicity of subjects, and the Committee on Accounts for that reason has wisely given to this investigating committee a broad discretion, which I can assure the gentleman will not be abused.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, if no one wishes that I yield to him, I now move the previous question on the resolution and amendments to their passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] moves the previous question on the resolution and amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, they will be considered in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, a motion to reconsider the resolution just passed, and the joint resolution passed immediately preceding it, was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Tuesday next is Memorial Day, and it happens to be my wedding anniversary day. [Applause.] I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama whether by adjourning to meet on Tuesday it is the intention to transact any business on Tuesday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it is not the intention to transact any business on Tuesday. I know it is the desire of a great many Members of the House to leave here in order to make Memorial Day speeches, and there will be very few Members present here, and I want to make an arrangement by which nothing will be done on Tuesday except to adjourn over until the following Friday.

Now, the reason I want to adjourn over until Tuesday is not to escape business to be transacted on Monday. Next Monday is the fifth Monday in the month, and therefore not a Calendar Monday anyhow. But a Democratic caucus has been called to consider the wool schedule of the Ways and Means Committee on Thursday, and I want to have the meeting convene at noon instead of at night. I am in hopes of being able to report the wool bill on Friday, provided the caucus agrees to the bill, and to present it to the full committee on Saturday, so that we may be able to take it up early the following week. For that reason I desire that the House adjourn until Tuesday. I will say to the gentleman that if agreeable to both sides we shall not transact any business on Tuesday except to adjourn over until Friday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Tuesday. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet Tuesday, May 30, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Utah, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF UTAH,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Charles S. Tingey, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the following is a full, true, and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 2, petitioning the United States Government to improve a certain part of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, as appears on file in my office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 25th day of May, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL.] C. S. TINGEY, Secretary of State.
By H. L. CUMMINGS, Deputy.

Memorial to the Congress of the United States of America, petitioning the United States Government to improve a certain part of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation.

To the honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that

Whereas Fort Douglas Military Reservation, adjoining on the east the residence district of Salt Lake City, contains approximately 9,995 acres; and

Whereas approximately 200 acres of this tract, lying between the improved residence district of Salt Lake City and the barracks and parade ground, is at present unimproved and unsightly; and

Whereas the Government has ample water rights and facilities, through its regular equipment at Fort Douglas, to improve this tract; and

Whereas at slight expense this 200 acres could be made and maintained as one of the most beautiful and attractive parks in the West; and

Whereas the city of Salt Lake is making corresponding improvements in its property adjoining: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Utah does hereby respectfully urge and request that steps be taken immediately by the Government, through the War Department, to make the improvements suggested, and to maintain the unimproved portion of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation in the manner justified by the nature, location, and surroundings of this tract.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

HENRY GARDNER,
President of the Senate.
E. W. ROBINSON,
Speaker of the House.

Approved March 9, 1911.
[SEAL.]

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 30, submitted by Mr. GAMBLE on the 4th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate; and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 31, submitted by Mr. HEYBURN on the 4th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be, and they are hereby, authorized, in the consideration of bills referred to it, to sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the recesses or sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as they may deem advisable, to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, to have the hearings stenographically reported, and to employ such expert and other assistance as may be necessary, and to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary, the expense of such investigations to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 52, submitted by Mr. SMITH of Michigan on the 23d instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to as follows:

Whereas certain bills are now pending before the Senate Committee on Territories providing for a civil government for Alaska, these measures having been proposed looking toward a thorough readjustment of the rules applicable to the government and control of that Territory: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to investigate the present needs and requirements of the people of Alaska, having especial reference to such legislation as may be necessary and desirable for the purpose of establishing a form of self-government or otherwise for said Territory; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee or any subcommittee are hereby authorized to sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the sessions or recess of the Senate at such time or places as they may deem advisable; and be it further

Resolved, That they shall be empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such stenographic or other assistance as they may deem necessary for that purpose, the expense of such investigation or inquiry to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That the committee is authorized to compile the Territorial laws applicable to Alaska, and order such printing and binding as may be necessary for its use.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 45, submitted by Mr. BURNHAM on the 22d instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time as may be necessary to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have printed such hearings and such other papers as may be deemed necessary in connection with subjects heretofore considered or to be considered by said committee during the Sixty-second Congress, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 2554) providing for the adjudication of the claims of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., by the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2555) granting an increase of pension to Philip Wining (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BOURNE:

A bill (S. 2556) to amend the enlarged homestead act of February 19, 1909, in so far as it applies to the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 2557) granting a pension to Albert W. Kelley; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 2558) making an appropriation of public money to install an elevator in the United States public building at Martinsburg, W. Va. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 2559) for the relief of L. L. Scherer; and

A bill (S. 2560) for the relief of the estate of James P. Yancey, deceased (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CLARK of Wyoming:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 32) authorizing chief clerks in offices of surveyors general to approve and sign plats and field notes of public-land surveys; to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE ORANGE JUDD NORTHWEST FARMSTEAD.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask for an order to print 3,500 copies of Senate Document No. 32, Sixty-second Congress, first session, for the use of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and the Post Office Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the character of the publication?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the document.

The SECRETARY. The Orange Judd Northwest Farmstead.

Mr. CULBERSON. I remember the document. It is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

The order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 3,500 copies of Senate Document No. 32, Sixty-second Congress, first session, The Orange Judd Northwest Farmstead, be printed for the use of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 75. A joint resolution reducing the number of Capitol police, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not like to object to a motion of this character, but——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a debatable motion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that, but I was going to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he could not withhold the motion until a little later in the afternoon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that, but I would suggest to the Senator that to-morrow is Memorial Day and the Senate has ordinarily adjourned on that day. I think it a very proper thing to do. A large number of Senators have suggested that they want to be away to-morrow. I will withhold the motion if the Senator desires it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish it might be withheld for the present. I would not object to adjournment over Memorial Day, which is usually observed by this body as a compliment to the sacredness of the day, when all citizens pause to acknowledge our great debt of gratitude to the saviors of the Union, but the motion can be renewed later in the day.

If the Senate will indulge me, when a motion is made that we adjourn to a day certain in the morning, at the beginning of the morning hour, most Senators take it as the signal that there is to be no other business done, and the consequence is that we go along from day to day without accomplishing anything or getting anywhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I withhold the motion. It is not a debatable motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire withholds the motion for the present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will make it a little later on, if necessary.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar is in order, under Rule VIII.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 1) to correct errors in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts approved March 4, 1911, was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 20) directing the Secretary of War to convey the outstanding legal title of the United States to sublots Nos. 31, 32, and 33 of original lot No. 3, square No. 80, in the city of Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 23) to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW. was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over, likewise, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy or Marine Corps, and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PERKINS. At the request of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], I ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

REPAIR OF THE "PORTSMOUTH."

The bill (S. 817) appropriating $25,000 for the repair of the wooden warship Portsmouth was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report (S. Rept. 40) submitted by Mr. PERKINS on the 24th instant was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 817) appropriating $25,000 for the repair of the wooden warship Portsmouth, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

Your committee has not been so fortunate as to secure the approval of this bill by the Secretary of the Navy, as the following letter will show:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, April 21, 1911.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received, with request for the department's opinion thereon for the information of the Committee on Naval Affairs, a copy of a bill (S. 817) appropriating $25,000 for the repair of the wooden warship Portsmouth.

In response I have the honor to say that the department has been requested by the Treasury Department to lend the Portsmouth to that department for use as a quarantine vessel at Fortress Monroe to replace the old and unserviceable sloop of war Jamestown now used for that purpose. The Secretary of the Treasury has been informed that this request will be complied with, and steps are now taking to prepare the vessel for the trip to Hampton Roads for the purpose of turning her over to the quarantine authorities. The repairs necessary to this end will cost about $1,100.

The use of the Portsmouth for quarantine purposes will, it is believed, best serve the interests of the Government, and the enactment of legislation for extensive repairs to the vessel, such as might be necessary were she to be devoted to other uses, is not therefore recommended.

Faithfully, yours, G. V. L. MEYER.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Your committee regrets that it does not take the view of the question which is held by the Navy Department, but believes that a vessel of the historic interest of the Portsmouth should be devoted to other uses than that suggested, and that the money it is proposed to spend for repairs will enable the Nation to preserve and maintain this noble vessel of the old Navy as a reminder of the predominating influence we once held upon the sea and as a visible incentive to all who fight under the flag to do their duty. We do not think that this honorable service of a noted fighting ship of the American Navy can be given by turning her into a hospital hulk for the use of a department of the Government for which she was not built and under whose direction she has never sailed. A brief recapitulation of the history of this old vessel will give, we think, the reason for the great public interest in her preservation and devotion to other uses than that proposed by the Navy Department. The following letter gives the principal points in her career:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
LIBRARY AND NAVAL WAR RECORDS,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1911.

MY DEAR SENATOR PERKINS: I have the honor to acknowledge your note of the 22d instant, and in reply send you the following brief history of the old Portsmouth:

U. S. S. Portsmouth, second of the name. Built at the navy yard, Portsmouth, N. H. (Kittery, Me.), in 1843. Her battery varied at different periods from 22 to 14 guns.

First cruise, 1844–1848, in the Pacific under command of Commander J. B. Montgomery, squadron of Commodore J. D. Sloat. Took a prominent part on coast of California in War with Mexico.

June 3, 1846, arrived in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal., and, July 5, 1846, landed a party of seamen and marines for the protection of American consul and citizens, under command of Lieut. J. S. Missroon, United States Navy, and Lieut. H. B. Watson, United States Marine Corps.

July 9, 1846, war having been declared, landed a force at Yerba Buena, by order of Commodore Sloat, took possession of San Francisco, and at 8 a. m. hoisted the United States flag in front of the custom-house. Sent detachments of officers and men to raise the United States flag at Sutter's Fort, Sausalito, Sonoma, and Bodega.

March 11, 1847, to October 29, 1847, captured three Mexican vessels. Two of them were ransomed for $14,929.

February 24, 1848, sailed from Valparaiso; reached Boston May 5, 1848.

From 1849 to 1851, one of the African Squadron.

From 1851 to 1854, Pacific Squadron.

From 1856 to 1858, East India Squadron, under Commander A. H. Foote; took most prominent part in the capture and destruction of the Barrier Forts, Canton River, November 16–22, 1856. In this engagement there were 7 Americans killed and 22 wounded. The Portsmouth was struck by shot 12 times. At the close of the action she was given three rousing cheers by the crews of the British men-of-war lying near.

From 1859 to 1861, African Squadron; captured several slavers.

From 1861 to 1865, West Gulf Squadron; with Admiral Farragut, commanded by Commander S. Swartwout, at passage of Forts St. Phillip and Jackson, occupation of New Orleans, and numerous engagements in the lower Mississippi. Made a number of prizes.

In 1866, quarantine ship, New York Harbor.

In 1867 to 1868, fitting as a training ship and on special duty.

From 1869 to 1871, South Atlantic Squadron.

From 1872 to 1877, special service to Brazil and Pacific Squadron.

In 1877, training ship for boys, San Francisco.

In 1878, special service in connection with the Paris Exposition.

From 1879 to 1894, training ship for apprentices, Atlantic coast.

January 17, 1895, transferred by the Navy Department to the Naval Militia, State of New Jersey.

At the present date lying at the New York Navy Yard.

Total cost of building and repair to December 15, 1851, $313,632.33.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES W. STEWART,
Superintendent Library and Naval War Records.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate.

It will be seen from the above that the Portsmouth has carried our flag with glory and honor into many widely separated portions of the world. She was a fighting ship and did bravely the duty of a fighter. The cheers given her by the crews of British men-of-war in Canton River were evidences of the appreciation of the bravery of the men who sailed under her flag, which was still more conspicuously shown under Farragut in the passage of the Mississippi forts. And in the Mexican War she made history on the Pacific coast, when she took possession of what was then the Mexican settlement of Yerba Buena, and, on raising the flag over the land which was thenceforth to be American, gave to the place the name by which the great city which has grown up there is now known over the civilized world. It was only natural, therefore, that the people of California should take a deep interest in this old vessel and should desire to have her preserved and stationed where she could pass the rest of her life within sight of the scene of one of the most important national events. In consequence it was proposed that the Portsmouth be sent to San Francisco, there to remain as long as she could be kept afloat. A year ago this suggestion was made to the Navy Department, which returned the following letter of disapproval:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, April 5, 1911.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your letter of April 20, 1910, in which you brought to the attention of the department the request of the Hon. Charles S. Aiken, acting secretary of the committee of exploitation and publicity of the Panama Pacific International Exposition, that the U. S. S. Portsmouth be sent to San Francisco, to remain at that place as a historic relic, I have the honor to advise you that the department, after mature consideration, has decided to lend this vessel to the Treasury Department for service at Hampton Roads in place of the old Jamestown.

The department arrived at this conclusion as a result of a general survey held on the Portsmouth, which showed that extensive repairs would be necessary to make this vessel safe for a voyage to San Francisco, and it is believed that the interest of the Government will best be served by the action taken in this matter.

Faithfully, yours, G. V. L. MEYER.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Since the attitude of the Navy Department became known there have appeared many protests against what is termed the proposed desecration. The following letter appeared in the New York World April 8, 1911:

A PLEA FOR THE PORTSMOUTH.

To the EDITOR OF THE WORLD:

The fate of the old wooden warship Portsmouth interests a wider America than did the saving of the Constitution by Holmes's poem. Atlantic joins Pacific in hoping that her remaining days may be spent inside the Golden Gate.

Although launched in the early uninteresting forties, the Portsmouth had the good fortune to sail into California's noble port in July, 1846, and hoist the American flag, thereby taking the initial step to bring that State into the Union. In following years the ship helped suppress the African slave trade, did gallant service in 1856 at Canton, China, under Commander Foote, and served with Farragut at the mouth of the Mississippi. Since the Civil War the ship has performed various duties, and is now at the New York Navy Yard, just released by the New Jersey Naval Militia.

The Navy Department would like to oblige California and send the Portsmouth to San Francisco to become a museum and take part in the Panama Fair of 1915, but declines, as it will cost $25,000 to repair the ship and send her there. The Florida, now being completed at this navy yard, will cost nearly if not quite $8,000,000.

The Portsmouth has outlived many iron pots and is as beautiful under full sail as when she emerged from the New Hampshire harbor in 1843. Her birthplace advances this plan:

Let the Portsmouth be the first ship to pass through the Panama Canal. It is her right historically. Don't send her to Norfolk to become a fever ship. How long must this particular ship work? Send her to Portsmouth, N. H., for repairs. Let her sail from her home port for San Francisco via the Panama Canal, the first ship through.

The added distinction will compensate San Francisco for waiting, and the Portsmouth will not be late at the fair.

A. E. W.

NEW YORK, April 8.

An editorial in the San Francisco Chronicle of April 17 says:

"The Navy Department certainly should reconsider its refusal to send the historic old war sloop Portsmouth to San Francisco. To use it as a quarantine hulk at Norfolk, Va., is a desecration. San Francisco is a city which is being rapidly populated by people from all over the United States, few of whom are very familiar with this State's history. The presence here of a vessel which played so important a part in the transfer of sovereignty in California from Mexico to the United States would provoke inquiry and stimulate historical reading."

At about the same time the following letter was addressed to the governor of California:

APRIL 10, 1911.

The GOVERNOR OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, Cal.

DEAR SIR: In the latter part of June, 1846, the United States sloop of war Portsmouth came into San Francisco Bay and dropped her anchor before the little village of Yerba Buena. On the 9th of July Commander John B. Montgomery, acting under instructions from Commodore Sloat, landed a party of 70 men, sailors and marines, took possession of the town, and raised the American flag on the plaza before the customhouse. The Portsmouth remained in Yerba Buena cove, to protect the town from recapture, until relieved by the Warren in the spring of 1847. Lieut. Bartlett, of the Portsmouth, who was put in charge of the town as first alcalde, ordered that on all public documents the name San Francisco should be used instead of Yerba Buena, which was but a local designation. Lieut. Misroon, with a party of sailors from the ship, erected a battery on Clarks Point, which gave a name to Battery Street. The name of Portsmouth Square was given to the plaza in honor of the ship, and Montgomery Street was named in honor of her commander. Some time ago it was decided that the ship was no longer fit for sea service and she was ordered sold. It was then suggested that she be sent to San Francisco and be preserved and cared for in consideration of her services to California and as a relic of historic importance. A board of examiners reported that it would cost $25,000 to place her in condition to make the voyage from New York to San Francisco, but it would only require $1,120 to make her serviceable for a quarantine-service ship, and she is ordered to Norfolk for that purpose.

I submit that this is an indignity the gallant ship should not be subjected to. She should neither be sold for junk nor converted into a hospital hulk. She should be sent to San Francisco and preserved and cared for as an object lesson and historical relic of patriotic interest to the school children of our State. I believe the Government would do this if the request came in proper form.

The New York Sun, in an editorial yesterday, said that the ship should be fitted out and sent around the Horn to San Francisco, and that the sooner the decision of the Navy Department was reversed the better; that the Portsmouth was intimately bound up in the beginnings of California, and should surely be on hand in San Francisco Bay when the Panama Canal is opened and the whole country is there represented to celebrate.

I would respectfully request that the Government be asked to send the ship to San Francisco.

Very respectfully, ZOETH S. ELDREDGE.

Still later came resolutions from the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco and the California Club of that city, as follows:

[Resolution adopted by the board of trustees of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco May 9, 1911.]

Whereas a resolution has been introduced in the Senate of the United States providing for necessary repairs on the U. S. sloop of war Portsmouth, the first naval vessel that unfurled the American flag at the Golden Gate, San Francisco, Cal., which action is designed to preserve a historical relic and object of patriotic interest: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, That the honorable Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to transfer the sloop of war Portsmouth to San Francisco, in accordance with the wishes of the people of the Pacific coast of the United States.

Attest:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SAN FRANCISCO,
WM. MATSON, President.
C. W. BURKS, Secretary.

[Resolution passed by the California Club on May 9, 1911.]

Whereas the old sailing ship Portsmouth played an important part in the early history of California, having sailed into the Bay of San Francisco in 1846, at which time its captain on July 9 of that year raised the American flag in a plaza, afterwards called Portsmouth Square.

Whereas it is rumored that the United States Navy Department is considering the matter of bringing the Portsmouth to San Francisco Harbor, and converting it into a marine hospital: Be it

Resolved, That the California Club, in view of the historical value of this ship to the people of California, does herewith petition the United States Navy Department, through its congressional Representatives, to place the old ship Portsmouth in the Bay of San Francisco and convert the same into a naval museum, where valuable historical relics may be properly cared for and exhibited, and that said ship and museum shall be placed permanently and established before the opening of the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

[Resolution adopted by the board of trustees May 13, 1911.]

Whereas a resolution has been introduced in the Senate of the United States providing for necessary repairs on the U. S. sloop of war Portsmouth, the first naval vessel that unfurled the American flag at the Golden Gate, San Francisco, Cal., which action is designed to preserve a historical relic and object of patriotic interest: Therefore be it Resolved by the Stockton Chamber of Commerce, That the honorable Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to transfer the sloop of war Portsmouth to San Francisco in accordance with the wishes of the people of the Pacific coast of the United States.

STOCKTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Attest: J. M. EDDY, Secretary.

The Merchants' Association of San Francisco wired the following message to the Secretary of the Navy:

To the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D. C.:

The Merchants' Association of San Francisco, representing 1,400 business firms here, earnestly petitions the Government to refit the sloop of war Portsmouth and send it to San Francisco, to be permanently stationed here—the first vessel to officially unfurl the American flag at San Francisco.

The vessel will also be of great historic interest to visitors during the exposition in 1915.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO,
M. H. ROBBINS, Jr., President.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., May 23, 1911.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Precita Parlor, No. 187, Native Sons Golden West, in meeting assembled adopted resolution calling on you as senior Senator from California to intercede with Department of Navy to save sloop of war Portsmouth from condemnation. The ship holds prominent place in the early history of California, and all loyal Californians wish to see it preserved. Our order wants this ship brought to California that it may be preserved as historic remembrance of California heroic past. We respectfully ask you to present our case to the Navy and Treasury Departments and to the President.

B. C. MCKINLEY, President.
GEO. F. WELCH, Past President.

Your committee believes that the public interest in the Portsmouth is sufficiently pronounced to warrant the expenditure of $25,000 to fit her for the sea voyage to California, and that the people would approve her transfer to San Francisco, there to remain as an incentive to duty to our Navy on the Pacific coast. We therefore recommend that the bill pass.

SUMMARY TRIALS IN THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 1724) to amend section 14 of "An act to promote the administration of justice in the Navy," approved February 16, 1909, and to provide for the destruction of records of deck courts in the United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 14 of "An act to promote the administration of justice in the Navy," approved February 16, 1909, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 14. That section 1624, article 34, Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby amended as follows:

"SEC. 1624. The proceedings of summary courts-martial and of deck courts shall be conducted with as much conciseness and precision as may be consistent with the ends of justice and under such forms and rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, and all such proceedings shall be transmitted in the usual mode to the Navy Department, where they shall be kept on file for a period of two years from date of trial, after which time they may be destroyed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSPENSION FROM PROMOTION IN THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 2004) to amend section 1505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for the suspension from promotion of officers of the Navy if not professionally qualified, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 1505 of the Revised Statutes so as to read as follows:

SEC. 1505. Any officer of the Navy on the active list below the rank of commander who, upon examination for promotion, is found not professionally qualified, shall be suspended from promotion for a period of six months from the date of approval of said examination, and shall suffer a loss of numbers equal to the average six months' rate of promotion to the grade for which said officer is undergoing examination during the five fiscal years next preceding the date of approval of said examination, and upon the termination of said suspension from promotion he shall be reexamined, and in case of his failure upon such reexamination he shall be dropped from the service with not more than one year's pay: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be effective from and after January 1, 1911.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RANK AND PRECEDENCE OF NAVAL ATTACHÉS.

The bill (S. 2316) fixing the rank and precedence of naval attachés was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter naval attachés while serving on duty at embassies abroad shall have the rank of captain, and while serving on duty at legations abroad shall have the rank of commander in the Navy. But all officers serving as naval attachés shall continue to receive the same pay and allowances which they receive under existing law, and nothing in this act shall be construed to increase such pay or allowances or to reduce the rank of such officers while serving as herein provided. The precedence of military and naval attachés at the same embassy or legation shall be determined by their actual precedence in the Army or Navy and not by any provision of law giving temporary increased rank to such attachés.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINOR BERRY.

The bill (S. 70) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the military record of Minor Berry was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. DIXON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be sent back to the Committee on Military Affairs for the reason that there was a mistake made inadvertently in reporting it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the bill be taken from the calendar and rereferred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

WILLIAM F. M'KIM.

The bill (S. 1754) to correct the military record of William F. McKim was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the fact that William F. McKim, who was a private of Company I, Second Regiment Kentucky Infantry, was absent without leave from the 10th day of April, 1863, to the 27th day of May, 1863, shall be no bar to any right, privilege, or benefit as an honorably discharged soldier to which he would have been entitled had he not been so absent without leave during the period specified.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let that bill go over until we can read the report.

Mr. JONES. I should like the Senator to let that bill go through. I do not think there is any objection to it. It has been considered very carefully. This man was simply absent for about four weeks. The testimony shows that he had actually applied for a furlough; that it had been secured for him; that he came back before the time expired; that he then served honorably; and that he was honorably discharged.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator—I simply had turned to the report and had not had time to read it—did the soldier voluntarily return at the end of four weeks?

Mr. JONES. He did.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, on that statement I see no reason why the bill should not pass, and I withdraw my objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES CARTER.

The bill (S. 938) for the relief of James Carter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James Carter, who was a first lieutenant of Company H, Twenty-third Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a first lieutenant of said company and regiment on the 24th of February, 1863, but that other than as above set forth no bounty, pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to or by reason of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the calendar.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I supposed the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would call up his motion at this hour.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to continue his discussion of his resolution?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not, Mr. President, but before the substitute motion is submitted, I desire to perfect my resolution if I can be recognized for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly, the Senator has a right to perfect the motion at this stage. The Chair understands the Senator from Wisconsin desires to suggest some changes in the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, at the close of the last session the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] offered a substitute for my resolution and asked for the floor and for recognition at the next session. I do not care to be recognized at this time except to call up the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand that the Senator desired to speak, but the Chair thought the Senator wanted to make his suggested changes now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want the opportunity to do so before the question is put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution.

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar No. 4, Senate resolution 6, by Mr. LA FOLLETTE: A resolution to appoint a special committee to investigate certain charges relative to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute for the resolution just stated, submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for a very few moments in relation to these resolutions, the one offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the substitute offered by myself. Of course, I shall have to address myself to the resolutions as they are now laid before the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In order that the Senator from Virginia may be advised, I will say that at the proper time I will offer an amendment to my resolution striking out the names of the five Senators in the resolution and providing that the Senate shall elect five Senators in open Senate on roll call, only Senators who were not Members of the Sixty-first Congress being eligible.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I understand from the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin substantially what his course will be. I will say that it is not impossible that when his resolution is presented I may make some changes in the resolution which I have offered as a substitute, but for the present I shall address myself to the general proposition which is before the Senate, with respect to which different views are presented to the Senate by the Senator's resolution and by the substitute which I have offered; and in doing so, as I have stated, I shall endeavor to be very brief and to confine myself to the special matter before the Senate.

There has been a good deal of discussion of certain general principles which may have some relation to and to some extent underly the proposition immediately before the Senate, but I shall not go into the discussion of those general propositions to which a good deal of allusion has been made and in respect to which very able arguments have been presented.

The question before the Senate, Mr. President, is not whether Mr. LORIMER is entitled to a seat in the Senate; the question is not whether fraud and bribery were used in his election. That question was once before the Senate on evidence and on a report of a committee of this Senate which had made an investigation, and when it was before the Senate it was carefully considered and elaborately debated. I considered at that time the merits of the proposition; I considered the case then on the evidence and on the law, and I reached the conclusion that Mr. LORIMER was not entitled to a seat on the floor of the Senate, that bribery and fraud had been used to secure his election; and I voted for the resolution which declared that he had not been legally elected and was not entitled to a seat on the floor of this body. I cast my vote after a conscientious investigation of the record and after a careful examination of all the questions which it seemed to me were involved. I had clear, distinct, and strong convictions at that time, and I have seen no cause to change the conclusion at which I arrived.

I did not then nor do I now question the sincerity and the integrity of those Senators who reached a different conclusion. The Senate decided the case on the evidence reported by the committee and after elaborate debate, and they decided that Mr. LORIMER was entitled to a seat in the Senate. As I have stated, I do not propose now to go into any discussion of that matter.

The question which is now presented to the Senate is not whether Mr. LORIMER was elected by fraud and corruption, but the question before the Senate now is, Shall there be a further investigation into the question as to how he was elected to a seat in this body?

It is hardly necessary, Mr. President, for me to engage in any argument to show that there should be a further investigation. If any Senator on this floor ever entertained a doubt about the necessity of further investigation, that doubt must have been removed when the Senate of the State of Illinois adopted a resolution and caused it to be certified to this body, declaring that they had discovered new and material testimony and calling upon the Senate to make a further investigation. So I say that it is not necessary under these circumstances to argue that there should be a further investigation. I do not believe there is a single Senator on the floor of the Senate to-day who does not believe that it is incumbent upon this body to make a new investigation into the circumstances attending the election of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in this body. I have certainly not heard a single voice raised against such an investigation. Every Senator who has expressed an opinion in my presence has said that the Senate should at once undertake an investigation of this vitally important matter.

Surely there can be nothing of greater or more vital importance to the Senate than the question of the right of a man to sit here and to exercise the privileges of a Senator. I say his right to exercise those privileges and to vote here from day to day when that right is seriously called in question, as is the right of Mr. LORIMER, should be investigated not only thoroughly but promptly. The resolution which I introduced had that purpose in view.

The fact that there should be an investigation being established, the next question is: What sort of an investigation should we have? The investigation should be promptly undertaken; it should be diligently prosecuted; it should be speedily concluded. All the testimony taken and the conclusions of the committee which makes the investigation should be reported to the Senate at the earliest possible moment. There is occasion, Mr. President, for the utmost dispatch in an investigation of this character, because the Senator from Illinois should not remain here in his seat and exercise a voice in the determination of great public questions unless he has been fairly and justly and lawfully elected. The dignity and the honor of the Senate is involved, and it is of the utmost importance that the dignity and honor of the Senate should be preserved by the exclusion from its membership of any man who has obtained a seat here by bribery, fraud, or corruption of any character.

I am sure that the Senator from Wisconsin can not by any possibility desire a more thorough and more exhaustive investigation than I do. The light should be turned on; every avenue of suspicion should be followed out. We should have a committee diligent, able, and earnest. The objective point of the Senator from Wisconsin and myself is one and the same.

The only difference between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself in this matter, if there be any serious difference between us, is as to the agency through which this investigation shall be made. The Senator from Wisconsin, as I understand, proposes to modify his resolution so as to provide that the Senate shall proceed to elect a committee to make the investigation. I do not question, Mr. President, the power of the Senate or the right of the Senate to raise a special committee for any purpose whenever it sees fit to do so. If I had the slightest suspicion that the Committee on Privileges and Elections would fail in the exercise of the duty which would ordinarily be devolved upon it in a matter of this sort, I would not hesitate to favor a special committee. I would not let any question of personal feeling interfere. I would not for a moment consider whether or not there might be those who would feel wounded or feel that a reflection had been cast upon them if I thought that there was even the remotest possibility that this work could not be discharged faithfully, earnestly, and exhaustively by the regular committee. But I do believe, Mr. President, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, composed as it is of able men, of honorable men, of patriotic men, of faithful men, will do whatever they undertake to do faithfully, exhaustively, thoroughly, and well. If the Committee on Privileges and Elections should find that it is inexpedient or impracticable in any way for it to meet the full responsibilities which would devolve upon it in case they are required to make this investigation, I feel that we can rely upon their fidelity and their patriotism to report that fact to the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEYBURN in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. JONES. I agree with all that the Senator has said, but it has occurred to me that it would be a proper course to refer all of these resolutions to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and allow the committee to report to the Senate such resolution as under the circumstances they thought would be best to bring before the Senate for consideration and adoption. I believe if that were done a very satisfactory solution of this matter could be worked out, and I want to suggest that to the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if that suggestion had been made earlier it might have commended itself—though I am not sure that it would have done so—to my mind. It has seemed to me that it was hardly necessary to have the Committee on Privileges and Elections formulate a plan for the Senate in this matter. I feel that the Senate can itself, by the adoption of a suitable resolution, make an order which will accomplish what we all want to accomplish. I think the Senate itself, in considering the several resolutions which are now before it and the amendments which may be offered to them, can perfect a proper resolution which will lead to a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into this matter without asking the Committee on Privileges and Elections to formulate that resolution for it.

The resolution which I offered was prompted by an earnest desire to accomplish those results. It provides that the investigation must commence at once. It provides that it must be proceeded with diligently. It provides that the committee must report to the Senate as soon as possible.

It provides that the committee shall make a special investigation of the so-called jack-pot fund. I have not a very satisfactory idea as to what this jack-pot fund is. I know enough to know that it is a taint on the whole election of Mr. LORIMER. I know that the Senate has not the power to investigate it except in so far as it relates to the election of a Member of this body. If the State of Illinois wants to have legislation in its State corrupted by a jack-pot fund, this Senate has nothing to do with it, so far as it relates to local matters of the State of Illinois. But when a jack-pot fund is created in the State of Illinois and it is alleged that it was used to effect the election of a Senator to represent the State of Illinois in this body, it is up to the Senate of the United States to find out exactly what the relation of that corruption fund was to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, and what effect it exerted on the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, if any.

I have provided in my resolution specifically that the committee shall make a thorough and exhaustive investigation into the so-called jack-pot fund in its relation and effect to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in this body. In other words, I have endeavored by the language of my resolution to require a prompt, a thorough, and an exhaustive examination into this whole matter as quickly as possible, and that the result of the investigation, with the evidence taken, shall be reported to the Senate as speedily as possible, including an investigation of the jack-pot fund.

Mr. President, as I have stated, I do not question the right, the privilege, or the propriety of the Senate creating a special committee to make this investigation if it sees fit so to do. I do say, however, that when we have a regular committee, a standing committee, of the Senate created for a purpose and given jurisdiction over certain matters which must come before the Senate, that the standing committee so created for those purposes should be required to exercise the jurisdiction vested in it, unless there be some good reason in any particular case why that committee should not be intrusted with that jurisdiction. I know of no reason why this committee can not be trusted with the responsible duty, and although there are many important matters now before committees of this body, there is no single matter before any committee of this body that is of more vital importance than the question which I am proposing to send to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, involving the right of a Senator to a seat in this body. I say that unless there be some reason to believe that this committee will not exercise its jurisdiction efficiently, faithfully, and thoroughly, the jurisdiction should not be taken from it.

Now, I do not attach so great an importance to the precedents as some Senators seem to attach. I have great reverence for precedents, but I am perfectly willing to see precedents trampled under foot whenever they are in the way of what is right and just and necessary for the public welfare. I have great respect for the feelings of individuals; I do not wish to wound the sensibilities, even the prejudices, of a single Senator in this body, but I do stand ready to wound the sensibilities, to trample on the prejudices, and to wound the feelings, if need be, of any Member of this body or any number of the Members of this body when the public welfare requires that it should be done. But there must be clear and distinct and satisfactory conviction in my mind that the public welfare requires me so to do.

Mr. President, none of us is free from bias in respect to the Lorimer case—not one of us. There can not be a man on the floor of the Senate to-day who has not some preconceived idea in respect to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in this body. I certainly have ideas and opinions. I acted on my ideas and my opinions and my convictions when I cast my vote at the last session of Congress. Every other Senator then a Member of this body entertained an opinion and expressed it by the vote which he cast when the case was under consideration. Every other Senator then in this body by the vote he cast expressed his opinion, expressed his conviction; and I do not question that he was as sincere and as honest and as patriotic in his vote as I was.

I claim to have acted conscientiously, after an earnest investigation and a careful consideration of the entire case in all its bearings. I do not question the fact that every other Senator discharged his duty just as honestly, conscientiously, and faithfully as I did, and whichever way he cast his vote, it was due to a conviction and impression which must to-day remain in his mind.

I hope and believe that such impression as was made upon my mind at that time—such conviction as still remains in my mind—can be removed by testimony.

If, on a further investigation, it can be demonstrated that WILLIAM LORIMER was fairly and honestly elected, and that neither bribery nor fraud nor corrupt practices of any kind were practiced in his election, it would give me infinite pleasure to cast my vote next time differently from the way I cast it the first time. But I confess, Mr. President, it would take an affirmative array of evidence. There is an impression which will stay in my mind until it is removed by satisfactory proof to the contrary. I believe the same is true of every other Senator who participated in the events of the last session of Congress. Not only must an impression exist in the mind of every Senator who participated in the trial at the last session of Congress, but I am sure no man who has entered the Senate since the vote was taken in the Lorimer case can be without an impression on his mind.

It is impossible that a man who has become a Senator of the United States, in view of the wide discussion of this matter, can have failed to form some opinion, one way or the other; and although he has not recorded it by a vote in this body, no doubt every one of them has expressed it with his associates; has expressed it privately and publicly from day to day in his contact with his fellow men. I do not believe there is any very considerable difference between the new Senators who came in for the first time at this session of the Senate and the Senators who participated in the trial at the last session of the Senate in respect to their convictions about the Lorimer case. We all have convictions the one way or the other, and you can not get a committee composed of Senators on which there will be one single member who is free from an impression one way or the other in respect to this matter.

It is, of course, unfortunate that a tribunal can not be organized entirely free from an impression one way or the other. It would be much better if the case were one of first impression with the tribunal which will be charged with handling it. But that is absolutely impossible, and I see very little difference between the old Senators and the new Senators, between the Senators who have recorded their convictions by a vote and the Senators who have not recorded their convictions by a vote, but who have formed and expressed their convictions from day to day during the last few months.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. My name has been used in the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. I hope no Senator here believes that I have either sought or desired a place upon this committee. I know I should not want to accept a place upon it upon the supposition that I have not very decided convictions upon the question whether fraud and corruption were used for the purpose of bringing about the election of the Senator from Illinois.

I agree thoroughly with what has been said by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], that any intelligent man, whether he be a member of the Senate or not, who has carefully read the testimony and heard the arguments on this question, must have some convictions on the one side or the other of a question so important to the people of this country.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is not necessary, I am sure, for me to say to the Senator from California that I never for a moment conceived the idea that he had sought or desired service on this committee. I will say, in addition, that it never entered my mind that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desired to place on that committee any man who had any bias either one way or the other. I do not think I am mistaken when I say that the Senator from Wisconsin put the names in his resolution without any consultation with the Senators whose names he inserted in it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I so stated on the floor during the course of my remarks upon the resolution. If I did not, I should like to have it definitely in the RECORD. When I offered the resolution naming five Senators to serve upon this committee I did not know the views or opinions of a single Senator named upon this subject. I had had no conversation with any one of the five men who were named with respect to their attitude of mind regarding the former hearing and the former action of the Senate, and I wrote in those names simply to place before the Senate, subject to such changes as the Senate might see fit to make, a resolution upon which the Senate might act in any way, enlarging the membership, as suggested by me, or changing the membership. But it expressed my idea that the membership of that committee ought to be composed of men who had not been Members of the Sixty-first Congress. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I was very sure I had heard——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to say further that I had no intimation from any source, either from the Senator from Wisconsin or from anyone else, that my name was to be used in any such way. The first intimation I had of the fact was when the resolution was read here in the Senate.

I desire to say further that, so far as I know, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had no knowledge or intimation as to what my convictions were upon this subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I was very sure that I had heard the Senator from Wisconsin express the views which he has just expressed. But I was not sure whether I had heard him express those views in private conversation or on the floor of the Senate. I would not have attributed to him any other views if I had not heard him express himself in either place. I believe he desires a thorough and an honest investigation of this case.

I believe he wants to get to the very bottom of it, as I want to get to the very bottom of it. I do not believe he wants any unfair tribunal or any unfair advantage, the one way or the other, in the investigation which it is incumbent upon us to make.

But, Mr. President, the question is, Where can we get the fairest tribunal? How can we organize a committee that will be entirely fair and impartial? It is absolutely impossible to get a committee, as I have stated, in the minds of whom there will not be some bias the one way or the other, whether the membership of the committee be from the old Members of the Senate or from the new Members of the Senate. I feel very sure, from the remarks made by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], in a recent argument he submitted to the Senate, that he has just as strong convictions and feelings about this matter as I have.

I feel that he would approach the consideration of this case with just as much bias upon his mind as I would approach it if it devolved upon me to make the investigation; and I do not believe, Mr. President, that the Senator from California is any exception in the list of new Senators who entered this body for the first time at the commencement of the Sixty-second Congress.

I do not believe there is a single new Senator in this body who has not just as much conviction about this matter as I have. They have all read about it; they have all thought about it; they have all talked about it; they have all expressed their convictions; and they will have to have those impressions removed by the evidence just as I will have to have the impressions on my mind removed by the evidence if I ever change my vote from the way I cast it before.

But if I know myself, Mr. President, I stand ready to change that vote if the evidence brought into this Senate by the new committee is such as to demonstrate the innocence of Mr. LORIMER. It must demonstrate a little more than the innocence of Mr. LORIMER personally, for his friends may have practiced fraudulent methods and may have resorted to bribery and corruption, and whether he knew of it and participated in it or not, if he was elected by bribery and fraud, it makes no difference who perpetrated the fraud or who gave the bribes, he is not entitled to his seat in this body if it was procured by methods of that sort.

But if I know myself I would gladly vote Mr. LORIMER a right to a seat in this body if evidence can be adduced, reliable and satisfactory and convincing, that can demonstrate that neither he nor his friends nor anyone else used bribery or fraud or corruption in procuring for him a seat in this body. As I entertain that feeling, as I will endeavor to live up to that purpose, as I hope I will be able conscientiously and honestly and justly to live up to that purpose of treating this case fairly, considering it justly, and determining it honestly when the new evidence and the new report will come in, I will not attribute to any other Senator a less honest or a less patriotic purpose than I myself entertain. Whether he voted as I did or voted differently from the way I voted, I must concede that he acted honestly and conscientiously, that he is open to conviction, and that he will vote when the case comes up again fairly and justly and honestly and in accordance with the evidence which may then be adduced.

Entertaining that opinion, I feel that we must all have charity enough to entertain that opinion toward each other. Not one of us can arrogate to himself a virtue superior to that of his colleagues on this floor. Not one of us has a monopoly of virtue, honesty, sincerity, or patriotism. I trust we all endeavor to live up to those high principles. I, in my humble way, have certainly endeavored to walk that path, and I will not attribute to a brother Senator a disposition to walk any other path until he has demonstrated his unworthiness of the high and honorable position which the State which sent him to this great body has conferred on him.

Now, Mr. President, when we come to select a committee to do this great and important and responsible work, which is so essential to the dignity and honor of this body and so essential to the perpetuity of our institutions, how are we to go about it? We can not get a committee without some bias, without some conviction one way or the other, whether we take that committee from the old Senators or from the new Senators, whether we take that committee from those who voted for Mr. LORIMER's right to a seat here or voted against his right to a seat here. Suppose we proceed as the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin proceeded. When he first took this matter up he endeavored to select a fair committee. I know he would not have selected willingly a committee with any undue bias or prejudice. I believe when his resolution was introduced, though the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] was here at the time, he had not made the address to the Senate which contained an expression of his views about the Lorimer case; but in his endeavor to get a fair and impartial tribunal the Senator from Wisconsin placed on it at least one man, the Senator from California, who has as strong a conviction about the case as either the Senator from Wisconsin or myself.

The Senator from Wisconsin shakes his head, but judging by the remarks of the Senator from California I think his conviction is just about as strong on this case as his mind is able to form about any matter. I am not criticizing the Senator from California. He would be hardly worthy of a seat in this body if he had not formed an opinion about the Lorimer case, in view of all the testimony which has been gone through. He had formed an opinion and no doubt had expressed it many times before he came to the Senate, and after he came to the Senate he availed himself of the very earliest opportunity to give to the Senate and the country his abiding conviction in the guilt of Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I hope the Senator will understand that I neither formed nor expressed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the Senator from Illinois. I have not done so. I referred to the fact that evidence which was adduced at the former hearing showed that corrupt practices were resorted to at the election, and that as I understood it that was the simple question submitted to the committee at that time, and upon that simple question I had my convictions and I have expressed them; but I have never expressed an opinion, and I have in fact never formed an opinion, upon the question whether the Senator from Illinois was himself guilty under the evidence that had been adduced. Now, there is additional evidence here, taken by the committee of the Legislature of Illinois, which may place an entirely different face upon the situation, and it may show—at least it has the tendency to show—that there was personal guilt upon the part of the Senator from Illinois whose seat is in controversy here.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the words I used were not aptly selected. Though I confess my language imported as much, I did not intend by what I said to attribute to the Senator from California a conviction as to the personal participation of Mr. LORIMER in these frauds, but he reached exactly the conclusion I had reached, and I meant to express that. He reached the conclusion that bribery and corruption had been used, and without the use of that bribery and corruption Mr. LORIMER would not have been elected. It was not necessary in determining Mr. LORIMER's right to a seat to go further and show that Mr. LORIMER was particeps in a personal sense, and had full knowledge and participation in the bribery and corruption; but when the conclusion was reached that bribes had been given to members of the legislature, that fraudulent and corrupt methods had contributed to the election of Mr. LORIMER, and that he would not have been elected without them, that disqualified him for a seat in this body.

That was the conclusion I reached, and it was expressed in my vote. That was the conclusion, as I understood it, that the Senator from California had reached, as expressed in the speech delivered by him on the floor of the Senate. So the Senator from California is just as much disqualified, if a bias of that sort can disqualify a Senator, as I am disqualified, or as any member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is disqualified.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I certainly had not intended to urge my qualifications as a member of this committee, but I simply wished to justify myself against the statement made that I had formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator's disclaimer is entirely unnecessary. Certainly no thought of that sort ever entered my mind. I simply meant to demonstrate by the Senator's attitude toward this matter the proposition that new Senators, as well as old Senators, had convictions, and were under bias in respect to the Lorimer case, and that when you look for an impartial committee you will find it impossible to get such a committee in the membership of the Senate as now constituted, either from those who were in the Sixty-first Congress or those who have appeared for the first time in the Sixty-second Congress. The bias is just as great in the one case as in the other.

The question is, where can we come as near as possible to securing a fair and impartial committee to make this investigation. If you go to work to organize a committee, how will you have it? Is it possible for the human mind to approach this subject in such a way as to make a selection for this specific purpose and that selection not be subject to more criticism than to take a committee that was created without any reference to this case? The standing Committee on Privileges and Elections as it is now constituted in the Senate, so far as the new members of the committee are concerned, was created, I am sure, without any reference whatever to this case and before the question of reopening the case had been agitated.

Senators who had served in the Sixty-first Congress and continued to be Members of the Sixty-second Congress and who had in the last Congress been members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections were, for the most part and probably all of them—I have not turned my mind to that examination—continued on the present committee. But there were new Senators put upon it and there were Senators who were in the last Congress and yet not members of that committee put upon it. The committee was selected without any reference to the Lorimer case or the proposed investigation. It is composed of able men. I would not make any comparison or any invidious distinction between the ability of Senators on the different committees, but I will go so far as to say it would be very difficult in the Senate to find an abler body of men than those who now constitute the Committee on Privileges and Elections. As they are able and honorable and patriotic men, and as they were placed upon the committee without any reference to this investigation, it seems to me that they must be as fairly constituted as any special committee that could be raised for this particular purpose.

Suppose we should go to work now to raise a special committee for this particular purpose, how would we proceed? We would start out with a full knowledge that every Senator has an opinion one way or the other with respect to the case. Will you divide the membership equally? Will you take half of your committee from those who voted in favor of Mr. LORIMER having a seat in this body and the other half from those who either voted differently or did not vote at all? If you do that, surely you will have a committee made up of biased Senators. I mean by biased an honest bias, a bias that must be in the mind of every honest man who has considered the case. Would that be any fairer committee than the Committee on Privileges and Elections? I think not.

I reached the conclusion in my consideration of this matter, in my thought in respect to it, that the fairest and the most effective and the most satisfactory method of procedure would be to send this investigation to the committee created by the Senate to take jurisdiction of matters of this sort, and put it up to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Every member of that committee is responsible to the Senate; every member of it is responsible to his State; every member of it is responsible to the people of this great country; every one of them is responsible to his own conscience, his own sense of right; and I say the wisest, the safest, and the justest way for the Senate to proceed, in my humble opinion, is to put this matter up to the standing committee of the Senate which was created to take jurisdiction of matters of this importance, a committee which was created without any reference to this particular case and which is composed of honorable and able and patriotic Senators.

Now, Mr. President, if the Committee on Privileges and Elections for any reason shall find itself unable to proceed with dispatch, with diligence, with promptness, with thoroughness, and with efficiency, if any member of the committee shall find that he is so biased that he can not exercise the jurisdiction justly and honorably, surely we can rely upon him as we rely upon the judges of our courts when they find themselves so situated in respect to a case that they are not able to proceed fairly and justly with the case. I say we can rely in like manner upon any Senator who finds either his other engagements or his state of mind such as to disqualify him from discharging the duty fairly and justly and efficiently, and I say we can rely on that committee to make a report to the Senate.

Let us put it up to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Let us place the responsibility where the rules of the Senate place it. Let us demand of them that they shall discharge the duties which they assumed when they accepted membership upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Let us rely on their fidelity and their high sense of honor and justice. If they are unable for any reason to proceed with the matter I say let us rely upon them to make report to the Senate and explain to the Senate why it is, if it be so, that they can not proceed in the exercise of this jurisdiction faithfully, promptly, diligently, and efficiently.

Now, Mr. President, that is the gist of this whole matter. The smaller matters to which I referred are matters about which we would all agree. Promptness in commencing the work, diligence in pursuing the work, an early report of the result of the work, a thorough investigation of the jack-pot fund, and an exhaustive investigation of every phase of this matter are what we all desire. The only point about which it seems to me there could be any material difference of opinion is in respect to the agency which the Senate shall employ to make the investigation.

I have briefly presented the reasons why I think the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections is as fair a tribunal as we can submit this investigation to. It is the regular course; it is in accord with the precedents. Of course, there are some precedents which being differentiated under some special reasons might seem to be the other way, but substantially speaking, all the precedents of the Senate point to the selection of the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

But even if the precedents were not that way and I am not a great stickler for precedents, I put this question on deeper and broader grounds than the matter of precedents. I believe it is a juster method. I believe it will bring better results. I believe it will offend fewer people. There are members of that committee who would feel that a different course would be something of a censure, something of a reprimand, something of a reflection. I do not think it would be either a censure, a reprimand, or a reflection. I do not believe the Senate would intentionally do either, but such a course would be susceptible of that construction, not only in their mind but in the mind of others; and I am not willing to take that course unless there be made manifest some controlling, some necessary requirement to do so. I do not believe any such requirement exists. I believe we will get through the agency of the Committee on Privileges and Elections exactly what we all want, a thorough and exhaustive examination and investigation, and a prompt report to the Senate of the results of that investigation, so that the Senate can take this case up again, consider it carefully again, and do complete justice and final justice in the matter. I sincerely hope that course will be pursued.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, could I yield my willing assent to this resolution as proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] I would not tax the patience of the Senate on this occasion.

I, Mr. President, first of all, am a Democrat. I believe in the principles of Democracy as truly and sincerely as I do in the religion of Jesus Christ. In religion I am a hard-shell Baptist; that goes ahead of my Democracy; but, sir, being a Democrat, being unwilling to yield assent to this resolution, I am impelled to give the reasons which actuate me to this course.

In the first place, Mr. President, this is not a party question. I have heard it stated, and reiterated time and again, upon the floor of the Senate that in the settlement of this question party politics plays no part. I accept that as true, because it has been stated by every Senator who has addressed the Senate upon this subject. Then, sir, if party politics plays no part in the settlement of this question, I, as an independent Democrat, have a right to vote as I see proper in this case unembarrassed by what my party leader or my party associates may have determined.

I am interested first, Mr. President, in a reopening of this case. It has been stated repeatedly on both sides of the Chamber that there is no objection to a reopening of this controversy. Then, if there is not, I am certainly delighted, because that is the pivotal point in which I am interested in this controversy. At the last session of Congress this matter was debated thoroughly, and I shall not enter into a discussion of any of the testimony. It will be remembered by Senators here how sharply the lines were drawn, how acute the discussion was. I say that I am interested primarily in the reopening, the rehearing, of this case. Why? Because I do not believe it was decided right at the last session of Congress. I do not reflect on any Member of the Senate who voted the other way. I concede, Mr. President, that good men may differ on this important proposition. Why, my father—the best man, I think, that ever lived on earth—and myself often disagreed, and he was more often right than I was. [Laughter.] So I say that good men may often disagree on the merits of a controversy and both be honest and conscientious. I am not going to challenge anybody's motives, but I say I am interested in the reopening of the case. Why? I am going to be honest about it and I am going to shell down the corn. If the testimony is as it stands to-day, my mind is made up. It will take lots of testimony—a whole parcel of testimony—to disabuse my mind of the fact not only that there were corrupt practices used in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, but that he personally knew all about them. He is either the biggest ass that ever disgraced the Senate or the biggest knave that ever disgraced the Senate. A man, Mr. President, in the light of this testimony, would have been the biggest fool—I withdraw that phrase, "the biggest fool," and will say that, in the light of this testimony, a man would have been a fool not to have known what was going on at Springfield during that election.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to Rule XIX, which forbids a personal reference to any Member of this body in terms.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the language. I realize that in my excitement, perhaps, I went too far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call to the attention of the Senator that it was more than the words which he applied, and the Chair suggests that the Senator bear that rule in mind.

Mr. DAVIS. I certainly shall, sir. Sometimes we get beside ourselves in the heat of debate, and I did on that occasion. I am willing to be called down. I wish all the newspapers to state that I was called down. They always get in the record everything against me anyway, so I will invite criticism now.

I am interested in the reopening of this case. After we have got the case reopened, I say, Mr. President, I am then interested in a fair committee. No man in the Senate wants Mr. LORIMER tried by an unfair committee, but no man wants him tried by a pro-Lorimer committee. I believe it is the sense of every Senator here that this matter shall go out to the country not only so as to give Mr. LORIMER an absolutely fair trial, but so as to preserve the integrity and honor of the Senate as well in the estimation of the country at large.

But, Mr. President, I have heard it said on this floor that public sentiment does not go for anything unless it is well-informed public sentiment, unless it is well-advised public sentiment, but I notice a great many Senators have always got their ears to the ground listening to the echoes of public sentiment. I want to say to Senators here that they need not lay the unction to their souls that the people do not know this case. We are told they do not know it, because they have withdrawn from the folding room of the Senate but a few copies of the testimony. My God, Mr. President! "Old Man People" gets his knowledge independent of books and papers, independent of schoolrooms, if you please. The child of nature, the true nobleman, God's nobleman knows these things, and he knows them in a way that very few people know about, but the people know this case. You can not fool them. They have rendered their verdict, and it is going to take testimony, and lots of it, to change the verdict in the minds of the public. I agree thoroughly that Senator LORIMER ought not to be tried by public sentiment; I agree that ought not to enter into the consideration of this case by each individual Senator; but, Senators, do not ease your conscience by saying that the people do not understand this case. They are bound to be informed. Public sentiment is not hasty and rash, but they know all about it. The new faces that will appear in this Chamber in a short time will be evidence that they do know all about it.

I do not agree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that this resolution perforce should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He says unless we believe that committee unfair, unless we believe them unpatriotic, unless we believe them unjust that a long line of precedents as to the stability of the working of the Senate and the dignity of the Senate require that this matter go to that committee. I say no. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has cited precedents to the contrary, but he did not cite the last case, the Dietrich case. I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the Dietrich case, where a committee was made up on the floor of the Senate by the Senate itself. I ask Senators here and I ask the country as well, What is unfair about that? What is unfair about merely having the roll call here now and somebody nominating the distinguished Senator from Vermont as a member of the committee?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that the Dietrich case did not involve the question of that Senator's election to this body.

Mr. DAVIS. No; but it involved the question of a committee to which the matter should be referred, and a special committee was raised for that purpose on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If I may be permitted further——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield still further to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The inquiry in the case referred to went to the personal conduct of that gentleman as a Senator and involved the question whether he had violated a statute of the United States while a Senator of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, that is simply splitting hairs. It is not a question of what the matter involved was, but it is a precedent of the Senate, whether or not it has been customary and usual, when a matter involved either the seat of a Senator or his integrity as a Member, it should be tried by a standing committee or be tried by a select committee raised on the floor of the Senate; and I say that in the Dietrich case a select committee was raised.

Why ought not this case be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? In the first place, Mr. President, without reflecting in the least upon that committee, many of whom are my personal friends—the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and others that I might mention, I hope are my personal friends; I trust they are, and, of course, the Democrats are all my friends—I do not intend in the least to reflect upon that committee, but why is it that this matter ought not to be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? There are 15 members of that committee, Mr. President. In March last 9 of them voted for Mr. LORIMER to retain his seat when this controversy was then up. Three of them voted against Mr. LORIMER, and there are 3 new Senators who have not voted at all.

Now, gentlemen, let us avoid all appearance of evil; let us be like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. What will the country say? You say, "Oh, you must not listen to the country." My God, you are here for the purpose of serving the country. You are the servants of the people; they are your masters; you are not their masters. Then you ought to heed their just admonitions. Nine members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections have already voted for Mr. LORIMER, 3 voted against him, and 3 have not voted at all. Now, in the very nature of things, do you think that this matter ought to be investigated by that committee again?

You ask, Do you think they will not be fair? I do not say they will not be, but I want just to shell down the corn.

Mr. President, if you would put me on that committee, I would go on there with a very strong predilection against Mr. LORIMER, and I want to tell you that it would take a whole lot of testimony to change that opinion. I am but a plain human being, actuated by the ordinary motives that actuate ordinary men. I am not above the things that move ordinary men to ordinary action. I say that those nine men that have previously voted to seat Mr. LORIMER ought not to be called on in any capacity to act in this matter.

But it is said we are going to have a select committee. I do not know whether we are or not. I am talking about the resolution as it is presented. There is a whisper running through the Chamber and the cloakrooms that perhaps it will be done in that way. I can not say. I am not on the inside of the holy of holies. I am sort of dancing around in the corners, and I do not know what is going on on the inside. I am arguing this resolution as it is presented on its face. What does it say? That this committee shall sit in banc. What does that mean? Altogether. You say that this is impossible for the whole committee to sit. Well, I do not know. You say some of them can not sit. I do not know, but the resolution as offered here to-day says that they shall sit in banc. I can not vote for that. I am not willing to turn this matter again into the hands of 9 out of 15 men who voted to seat Mr. LORIMER in the face of what I concede to be the plainest case ever made out against a man in the courts of the country.

Now, what else? They ought not to ask the committee to take up this work; the committee ought not to ask for it, and they ought not to want it; but, above and beyond all that, Mr. President—and I have said twice as much as I thought I would—I want to say "Poor, old LORIMER!" He has been garroted—is that what you call it?—that is a ship term; scuttled, in other words. He is gone, and it does not make any difference how you get at it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend while the Chair reads the Senator the rule of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw that remark, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the language of the rule to the Senator.

No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think what I have said reflects on the Senator. But I accept the ruling of the Chair. Let us take another term. He has been "marooned." I think that does not reflect on him, does it? He has been "marooned." The ship has left him. He has been put out on a lonely island, and the procession has gone by him. His friends have deserted him. Poor LORIMER has been marooned; he is out on the island by himself. It does not make any difference whether the resolution as originally proposed to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] prevails or the one offered by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] or the one offered by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], poor LORIMER has been marooned. He is left, and the procession has gone by.

I am sorry in a way for Mr. LORIMER, because I am sorry for any man who is in trouble, and especially am I sorry for a man, Mr. President, when it seems everybody is against him if they say a certain thing is true.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections had this whole matter under consideration at the last session of Congress. The talk about this fellow Hines and a hundred-thousand-dollar fund. All this could have been gotten last year by the Committee on Privileges and Elections just as well as it could be gotten now, because it existed then just as it exists now. There has been no new testimony developed; there have been no new facts produced. It is simply a question of the gathering by the new committee of facts that existed at the time of the other committee's investigation. I say this talk about Hines existed at the time that the Committee on Privileges and Elections had charge of this case. That matter was not gone into. We are assured that if this matter is now referred to that committee it will be gone into. Mr. President, let us just go at it in an old-fashioned way. Let us raise a committee here among ourselves. Let each Senator nominate somebody and let us elect a committee. Is there anything unfair about that? Could anybody on earth say that that is wrong?

I am a Democrat and I am not accustomed to throwing bouquets at Republicans, but I want to say in behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that I think he is about as good a Democrat as we have here. In late days he is getting around to the right doctrine mighty fast; he is getting converted awfully fast; in fact, Mr. President, these "insurgents," about 13 of them, if they will do what they say they will, if in their actions they will live up to their speeches in the Senate, are all pretty good Democrats. I do not know whether they will do it or not. But this fight, I say, ought to have been between the "standpat" Republicans and the "insurgents," if fight there had to be about the mode of conducting this investigation. But, instead of that, the Democrats have assumed to enter into it. The distinguished Senator from Vermont, chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, no doubt rejoices to see my friend from Virginia take the fight off of his shoulders. No doubt he is tickled down to the bottom of his boots when he sees the Democrats jump into the breach at the mouth of the gun and take the fight from the shoulders of the "standpat" Republicans. I for one, Mr. President, am not willing to do it. Let the Republicans fight it out among themselves.

But for Senator LA FOLLETTE, I want to say that he has made a manly, game fight. Probably he introduced his resolution a little bit early, but he has made a manly, game fight.

I am answered that if LORIMER is gone anyway, then what is all this talk about the way it is done. Mr. President, I plead for Democratic regularity. I do object to the Democrats taking the fight that belongs to the "standpat" Republicans and flying into the face of our natural allies, the "insurgents" of this body. I say that the Senator from Wisconsin has made a game fight. He introduced the resolution probably a little prematurely, but he introduced it, did he not? It may be said that it did not need a three-day speech and did not need any long-winded argument to convince the Senate, and that 50 Senators would have introduced a resolution if he had not; but they did not do it, did they? The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is the only man who introduced a resolution to reopen this case. He has made the fight, and as a Democrat, because I believe him right, I am willing to stand with him and give him what meed of credit he is entitled to for the manly fight he has fought.

Mr. President, he has suggested a fair manner of selecting this committee, just to nominate them right here, pick them right here from the floor, and elect them. Do it in the open. Do it where everybody can see you. Do it under the clearest sunlight of God himself. Let the public know what is going on. Do not do it behind closed doors, in closets, in back places; do it here.

Sir, perhaps I have said more than I should. I am intensely interested in this matter, and but for the fact that I felt this deep interest I should not have spoken at all.

I regret, sir, more than any man the fact that I shall have to leave some of my Democratic friends on this vote, but I will take my record, Mr. President, and lay it right by the side of the Denver platform. I say I am as good a Democrat as ever stood in shoe leather.

Take my record since I have had the honor to be a Member of this body and lay it down by the square and compass of the Denver platform and you must say that JEFF DAVIS is a good Democrat. I do not like to leave my Democratic friends and get among the Republican insurgents, but I will have to do it on this vote.

Having said this much, Mr. President, I conclude my remarks.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I first make a parliamentary inquiry. During the course of the observations to which we have just listened, I understood the Chair to hold that the rule which prohibits a Member of the Senate from reflecting in any way upon another Member of the Senate in public debate is applicable to the Senator now under discussion. I ask the Chair whether I correctly understood his ruling?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would say that the legal status of the junior Senator from Illinois, so far as being a Member of this body, is identical with that of every other Member.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask one further question. If, then, we were discussing the question as to the guilt or the innocence of the sitting Member; that is to say, discussing the testimony which has already been laid before the Senate in one way or another, and if a Member of the Senate in that debate were to declare that in his opinion it established a guilty knowledge or a guilty participation in the corruption occurring at the election, the Chair would hold that that would be in violation of the rules of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would not so hold. The action of the Chair was based upon the epithets, if I may term them such, applied to the junior Senator from Illinois. The Senator from Iowa may not have heard the expression.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear the expression.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He was called by two opprobrious names.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear what was said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was because of that that the Chair felt called upon to remind him of the rule, without requiring him to take his seat—merely to admonish him.

Mr. CUMMINS. The reason I make these inquiries is, while I may not debate the matter upon its merits at this time, I am very anxious not to fall under the condemnation of the Chair or the condemnation of Senators who desire to observe the rules of this body.

Mr. President, the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], coupled with the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], presents two definite questions, and only two, to the Senate. The first is, Shall the Senate proceed to a further investigation concerning the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in this body? The second is, By what instrumentality shall the Senate proceed with the further investigation if it be decided that additional evidence ought to be taken?

I gather from what has been said on all sides that concerning the first proposition or question there is no controversy whatsoever. We seem to have reached a common conclusion with regard to that part of the controversy. Every Senator here seems to be convinced that, by reason of the occurrences elsewhere since the vote upon the former resolution was taken, it is our duty to further inquire with respect to the circumstances concerning the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to this body.

I therefore shall not exhaust a single moment of your time or any part of my strength in the examination of that proposition. I come, therefore, immediately to the consideration of the two methods which are proposed—the one by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the other by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

I have a decided opinion with regard to the two methods of making this investigation. I believe that the resolution proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, modified as he has suggested, will furnish a more adequate investigation, a completer inquiry into the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, than though it were committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and therefore I stand for the select committee.

I have been wondering ever since this debate began whether I would be able to express the opinion I hold without being offensive. I do not intend to be offensive. I feel no unkindness toward the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am quite ready not only to admit, but to insist, that the committee is composed of high-minded, intelligent, patriotic men and patriotic Senators, as so often declared by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. And I trust that not a single word that falls from my lips will be so construed as to reflect in the slightest degree upon the purpose of the Committee on Privileges and Elections or the purpose of any member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

But in my judgment this committee substantially disqualified itself by the manner in which the former investigation was carried forward, not disqualified itself by reason of any want of desire on the part of the committee to reach the truth, not disqualified itself by reason of any desire upon the part of the committee to present to the Senate fairly and impartially the result of its investigation and its deliberations, but it has disqualified itself, in my opinion, because of the views which the members of that committee held apparently with regard to the scope of the powers of an investigating committee and because of the rules of law which the members of the committee feel ought to control such a body of men in making an investigation of this character.

This is not a new proposition of mine. It is a conclusion that I expressed in the very first sentences of the observations I had the honor to make months ago, when the resolution relating to the seat of WILLIAM LORIMER was before the body for decision, and I beg to read a word or two from my remarks at that time, in order to remind Senators of the exact situation.

I think there is great force in the suggestion that new men would be more effective for a great number of reasons than any of the old Members of the Senate. But I do not attach so much importance to the opinions we hold with regard to the guilt or the innocence of Mr. LORIMER. We all hold those opinions. Possibly we do not all hold the pride of opinion that must be experienced by those of us who have voted upon the resolution, but, nevertheless, every intelligent man in the United States has an opinion with regard to the guilt or innocence of WILLIAM LORIMER. I agree in some respects with the declaration recently made, that if we could find a man within the limits of the Republic who had no opinion with respect to the merits of the case, we would at the same time find a man utterly disqualified to express any opinion on it.

But an opinion with respect to the guilt or the innocence—and I am speaking now of guilt and innocence as synonymous with the validity of his seat in this body—is one thing. Entirely aside from that, if I find a Senator here who holds a certain view of the law, who holds a certain view with regard to the scope and functions of an investigating committee, that does not correspond with my own, an opinion which I believe, if carried into execution, will not result in a full and comprehensive and complete investigation, then I do not want that man to investigate this subject, not because he is dishonest, not because he is not intelligent or patriotic, not because he has not all the attributes which we love to find in American citizens, but because he has adopted a false view of the law.

That is my suggestion with regard to the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who formerly looked into the circumstances which preceded and which surrounded the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

Let us see. I read from the opening sentences of a former speech of mine upon the same subject:

Whether WILLIAM LORIMER had guilty knowledge of the efforts that were being made in his behalf, and which finally resulted in his election, I do not say; it is not necessary for me to declare an opinion upon that subject, and the attitude of the committee with respect to it has made it exceedingly difficult for anyone to reach a proper conclusion with regard to it. I question that attitude in this: The committee seems to have assumed that the Chicago Tribune was the plaintiff in the case before it and that WILLIAM LORIMER was the defendant, and that the admissions and statements made on behalf of the plaintiff concluded the committee in so far as those admissions and statements were made against the interest of the plaintiff. It appears that because counsel for the Chicago Tribune announced, in response to a suggestion from the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], a member of the committee, that personally he did not intend to connect Mr. LORIMER with the bribery, and that at another time, in argument upon the admission of evidence, stated—and I now quote—"we do not contend he had anything to do with it," therefore the question of Mr. LORIMER'S participation in or guilty knowledge of the corruption was eliminated from the investigation, and there seems to have been no effort from that time forward to pursue that particular phase of the subject.

I do not agree with such attitude upon the part of the subcommittee. I do not think that the Chicago Tribune was the plaintiff. I do not think that any admission or statement made by the counsel for the Tribune could in any wise restrict or limit the powers or duties of the committee raised by the resolution of the Senate.

And more of the same character.

This subcommittee, composed of most intelligent men, and men who are just as wholly dedicated and devoted to the public service as any of the Senators of this body, met in the city of Chicago, and the subcommittee organized itself into a court—a court not of investigation, but a court of trial—and it proceeded to try a suit in ejectment brought by the Chicago Tribune against WILLIAM LORIMER. It sought for no testimony that was not produced by the plaintiff. It sought for no testimony that was not brought forward by the defendant; and it measured the competency of all the testimony offered with all the rigor and the technicalities of the common law with respect to the admission of testimony.

In the 700 pages composing this record a large part will be found to be consumed in useless and senseless arguments made by counsel respecting the admissibility of testimony; whether the testimony suggested was hearsay testimony or whether it was secondary testimony. So the investigation proceeded with absolute fidelity upon the part of the full committee to the principle upon which it was instituted, but I do not believe that that is the office of an investigating committee. It is not a committee for the trial of Mr. LORIMER. This Senate is the body which tries Mr. LORIMER. The committee ought to be one that would search here and there and everywhere to elicit testimony, no matter where found or how found.

I deny that evidence must be tested by the rules of common law in order to ascertain whether it shall be submitted to the investigating committee or not. I agree that when the testimony finally comes to the Senate, then we must take the evidence and subject it to that scrutiny and subject it to those tests which the long experience of civilized mankind has ordained in order to ascertain the truth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the very best of faith the members of the subcommittee adopted this plan for investigating the election of WILLIAM LORIMER. With a high intelligence they proceeded upon this plan to hear the evidence submitted by the newspaper upon the one side and by Mr. LORIMER upon the other. With great and comprehensive knowledge of the law they subjected all the evidence to these rules of the law which are applicable in the courts of the country. If you want that kind of an investigation, then this committee, which has already assumed a position with regard to such things, ought to be commissioned to carry on the inquiry.

Now, mark you, there is no reflection upon any member of the committee in saying this. I differ from a great many Members of the Senate upon a great many things, but I hope that it is not thought disparaging to any Senator to say that he differs from all or part of his fellow Senators with regard to questions of either law or of fact. I differ from this committee as it was then composed with regard to making investigations such as this. I deny that it ought to be a committee of trial and insist that it be a committee of investigation. I deny that the testimony which is brought forward must bear the tests of the courts in the trial of cases. I insist that the committee has a perfect right to take any testimony whatsoever that in its judgment will lead to competent evidence upon the substantial or the pivotal fact to be decided by the Senate. I want a committee of real investigators to go out, unhampered, unrestricted by any declaration that they have ever made of the law before by any vote that they have ever cast upon the subject, to go out and pursue every channel open to the inquiring mind to ascertain the truth with regard to the election of WILLIAM LORIMER. I do not believe those members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections who either sat as a subcommittee before or those members who approved the conduct of the subcommittee in the management of the investigation can with that freedom, that liberty we ought to expect in an investigating committee, go forward and do this work. I care not what the precedents are, what we want is the truth, and we want it gathered in the way I have suggested, if that be the way approved by a majority of the Senate.

I understand there are two types of minds in the Senate. There are more upon a great many subjects, but there are at least two upon this subject. I made this same objection before. It was not only assumed by silence on the part of the committee that that was the real way in which to carry forward this investigation, but that course was openly defended upon the floor of the Senate. Senators will remember a somewhat spirited discussion carried on between the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and myself with regard to this very matter. He declared with all the eloquence that attends his utterances and with all the sincerity which accompanies his arguments that the trial between man and man—he considering this case as an ordinary trial, with the plaintiff on one side and the defendant on the other—was the best way to adduce the truth, and that the committee did entirely right in allowing the newspaper on the one hand to take charge of the case and Mr. LORIMER'S counsel upon the other. I have no reason to believe that he has changed his opinion with regard to that subject. I have no reason to believe that a single member of that committee has changed his honest and often expressed opinion upon that subject.

If therefore you recommission this committee to conduct the inquiry what do you expect? Do you expect that it will go to Chicago or remain in Washington and invite those who have made those charges against Mr. LORIMER to appear with their evidence, and that side having concluded do you expect that then Mr. LORIMER will bring forward whatsoever testimony he thinks makes for him? Do you expect that this testimony will either be admitted or excluded according to the rules of the law which apply by their strictness in the trial of cases?

If you do, then the Committee on Privileges and Elections will carry on this inquiry as honestly and efficiently as any body of men that can be found in the Senate. But if you want a committee that starts upon this line with a determination to find everything that is to be known with regard to the matter, whether it finds it at Springfield or St. Louis or whether it finds it at Centralia or Ottawa, whether it finds it in Chicago or in Washington, a committee that understands its duty to be to make whatever inquiry is necessary to lead to the truth, with no responsibility upon the part of any other person or any other concern to bring forward any testimony whatsoever—if that be what you desire, then you will adopt the resolution presented by the Senator from Wisconsin.

We had this difference of opinion before and we have it still. I shall have no word of criticism to enter upon anyone who differs with me with regard to it, but if I can do it without being disagreeable and offensive I want the Senate to understand what the issue is, and, understanding it, it seems to me that, without any reflection upon any member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with the full appreciation of the honorable character of every member of that committee, we must, if we desire to satisfy the demands of the country—I speak these words deliberately—carry on this investigation by a committee that has not adopted as its policy the plan that I have endeavored so inadequately and meagerly to set forth.

It is of just as high importance that the people of this country shall believe that the Senate of the United States is composed of men who sit here with unimpeachable and honest titles as that these titles be unimpeachable and honest. The confidence which the people of this country may have in the laws of the country, in the purity and integrity of purpose of those who make the laws, is, I think, of even greater importance than that the laws themselves be wise and just. We have stood here too long already against the wish and purpose and desire of the great mass of the people of the United States.

I did not intend to enter these broader questions at all, but they come to me now at this moment with such force that I can not relinquish the floor without saying one word with respect to our supreme duty in such matters as this. I heard the other day, accompanied, of course, with great compliment to the integrity and the intelligence of the people, the suggestion that we must go very, very slowly in responding to the wishes and demands of the people lest we shall respond to an unintelligent clamor of impulse and of passion. Senators, for 25 years and more the people of this country have been insisting that the Constitution composed by our forefathers should be changed so that the Members who sit in this body shall be elected by direct vote. Will anyone suggest that this demand, continuing now over a quarter of a century, is an impulse or a passion? Can anyone assert that it does not represent the deliberate, the thoughtful, the persistent purpose of a great majority of the people of this country?

Six times now has the one branch of the legislative government of the United States passed this resolution. Five times has the Senate of the United States either deliberately ignored the demand or rejected it upon consideration. The people are not only patient, but they are persistent still, and they intend to change this part of the Constitution, if, as Grant said about the war, it takes the century to do it.

Our forefathers—I do not criticize them—put into the Constitution obstacles against amendments which seemed wise to them and with which we must comply, but obstacles which are exceedingly difficult to surmount. Two-thirds of each of these bodies must agree to the resolution, and then when two-thirds have agreed to the same resolution, in the same words, three-fourths of the Commonwealths must ratify it in order that it may become a part of the organic law. Every obstacle apparently is removed except the obduracy of the Senate.

I do not say that Senators ought not to exercise their own judgment with respect to the propriety of voting for this amendment or not, but I do say that Senators should give great heed to the desire of the people to be given the opportunity to say whether they want to change their Constitution or not. It is not our Constitution. This Constitution belongs to 90,000,000 people or more. Yet we stand here determined that they shall have no opportunity to declare whether it is the Constitution they want or not.

I do not cavil at or criticize the argument which I have often heard made here, but it is an argument that ought to be made upon the hustings; it is an argument that ought to be made to the people who vote to determine whether our Constitution shall be changed or not. It is our duty to heed, to respond to the fundamental primary demand of the citizens, namely, that they be given an opportunity to say for themselves whether they want the Constitution changed or whether they want it to remain as it is.

Just so I feel regarding the agitation for the last year respecting the two new States in the southwestern part of our country. It is not my purpose to debate the merits of the initiative, referendum, or recall. However, when New Mexico comes to the Congress with compliance with every provision of the enabling act, and when Members of the Senate would vote for the admission of New Mexico if it were not for a provision in the constitution which has been adopted by the people of that Territory relating to its amendment, I say that we are intruding upon the province of the people themselves. I do not like the provision of the constitution of New Mexico with regard to its amendment, but I feel that I would be impertinent if I were to withhold my vote upon the proposition upon condition that the people should again vote upon or change this provision of the constitution. They know what they want, and if the State is otherwise entitled to demand, we ought not to longer hinder her entrance to the Commonwealths of the Union.

Just so with regard to Arizona. I know there are many Senators here who do not believe in the initiative or the referendum or the recall. I do. But you ought to say precisely what I have said respecting the constitution of New Mexico. The people of Arizona, in a deliberative, thoughtful, and patriotic way, adopted their constitution; and if it presents a republican form of government, it is an insult to every man and woman and child within the limits of that Territory to declare that they must again vote in order to see whether their former expressed opinion was a deliberate and calm expression of judgment upon these vital matters.

These are the things which are in the minds of the people. These are the things which are unsettling the confidence of the American people in our legislative bodies. These are the things which promote the Senate of the United States to a high place in the criticism and censure of many men and many women, too, throughout the borders of the country.

I return, however, to the question in hand. The only point of difference is, shall we elect an investigating committee—not a committee to hear testimony, not a committee to try Mr. LORIMER. If we had the testimony, or if it were to be brought forward by interested people to be laid before the committee in order that the committee could examine it and judge of it and determine its competency, I would not be so insistent upon the resolution presented by my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. But we are not organizing a committee of that sort. We are organizing a committee which we know has a fight before it. We are organizing a committee which we know will be confronted with all the devices which ingenuity and wealth can create in order to prevent a successful issue to its deliberations.

I submit we will be more likely to secure the services of the investigating committee, the committee that has a purpose and has a mission and that recognizes its duty, or ought to recognize its duty, to go forward and search the United States from one border to the other for every item of testimony that will shed light upon this vital issue, by the election of five men who were not Members of the Sixty-first Congress than we will be to commit the subject again to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, an hour or so ago I made a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be until Wednesday next. Since then many Senators from both sides of the Chamber have suggested that the public business will be expedited if we adjourn until Thursday. Many Senators are going to leave the city and will not be able to get back on Wednesday. The chairman of the Committee on Finance has suggested to me that if that committee could have a full day on Wednesday in his opinion the committee would conclude its work and be able to report the bill to the Senate speedily thereafter. It is important that we should know whether we are going to adjourn over Wednesday, the Printing Office having made inquiry because of the arrangements for the employment of their large force.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to move that when the Senate adjourns it be until Thursday next, but I do not propose to urge that. If a majority of the Senate shall vote it down, I will be quite content; and if it is voted down I will then make a motion that when the Senate adjourns it be until Wednesday next. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until Thursday next at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand the matter is not debatable, but I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will do that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply desire to say that my purpose in asking the Senator from New Hampshire to withhold the motion in the earlier part of the session was not that we should not adjourn over Memorial Day, which is the custom, and which has been most appropriately observed ever since I have been a Member of this body. My purpose, however, was to direct attention to the fact that the moment we decide to adjourn Senators reach the conclusion that no vote will be reached and absent themselves for the day.

I hope, Mr. President, we may reach a vote on this resolution to-night. I think it is important, if we are to commission anyone to make this investigation, that it be done promptly, and I sincerely hope that before we adjourn we may reach a final vote authorizing a thorough investigation of the charges affecting the election of the junior Senator from Illinois.

But, Mr. President, I desire to commend the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire that we adjourn over until Thursday. Many Senators are necessarily absent on Memorial Day and can not get back in time for the proceedings on Wednesday, and I hope the course suggested by the Senator may be followed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before the Senator from Washington proceeds——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. With the consent of the Senator from Washington, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and I ask that the Secretary read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 2, line 2, to strike out the word "any" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "the"; on line 3, page 2, to strike out the words "of the Senate or of" and to insert the words "between the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second."

Also, in line 8, on the same page, after the word "it," to insert:

> And any member of said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to direct the issuance of a subpœna or subpœna duces tecum, and he may summon such witness or witnesses as he may deem necessary in the course of said investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition does the Senator from Michigan desire made of the amendment which has just been read?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I merely ask that it lie on the table until it is reached in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the decision of the question to be investigated by the committee provided for in either one of the pending resolutions practically will depend upon the determination as to the nature of that committee—as to which one of these resolutions shall be adopted—and in view of the further fact that no more important question will be before the Senate, and that it is about to be disposed of, I desire to say a few words, based upon the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which investigated the case at the former Congress.

I apprehend, Mr. President, that we have at least the freedom and latitude in criticism or argument upon the report of this committee that a litigant in a court would have in criticizing the judgment of the court in an argument before the judge for a new trial. As has been well stated, difference of opinion as to the conclusion or even as to methods by which the inquiry is to be conducted does not necessarily imply a reflection upon the personnel of the committee, nor upon their motive, character, or integrity, although there has been some intimation that this matter should not be dealt with and that the correctness of the opinion of the former committee ought not to be impugned. I do not understand that the rules of the Senate preclude free criticism of the correctness and of the justness of the report which was filed by that committee. If they did, the usefulness of the Senate would be very largely handicapped and impaired. Under the practice of so-called senatorial courtesy, or so-called senatorial dignity, if Senators would not be free to differ radically and absolutely in their opinions upon every matter upon which the Senate is called upon to act, then the usefulness and the effectiveness of the Senate of the United States as a legislative body must necessarily be greatly impaired.

Some Senators have compared the situation in which we are placed to that of jurors; others have compared it to that of a judge. I hardly think that either a juror or a judge represents the function which the Senate is to exercise in the determination of the validity of title to the seat of the Senator from Illinois. There is a great case here to be tried; it is to be tried by the Senate of the United States. Nobody ever heard of a case being tried by a jury alone, without some other functionary of the tribunal, nor by a judge alone. It is absolutely necessary in proceedings in court that there should not only be a judge and a jury, or a judge alone, but that there should be an officer of the court, a functionary whose duty it is to take the question up, prosecute it, bring it before the court—not to see that the one side or the other should prevail unjustly, but one of the officers of the court, and as a part of the court—to see that all the evidence which relates to the matter that can be produced shall be produced and shall be fairly presented, and that every reasonable deduction that can be drawn from the evidence shall be presented as forcibly as possible to the court, and that there shall also be counsel upon the other side.

It seems to me that a committee appointed by this body to investigate the validity of the title to a seat in this Senate, if it is to perform its duties effectively, must necessarily contain within itself the power to push the investigation, to take the initiative. The duty must necessarily rest with it to make inquiries, not, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has aptly said, to sit simply as a court and to have the evidence brought to it; but it is the duty of the committee to go out and look for the evidence and bring it in, and, if it is necessary, to appoint counsel for that purpose.

The resolution of the Senator from Virginia provides for the appointment of counsel, not by the Chicago Tribune, but by a committee of the Senate. The duty of that counsel will be to prosecute the case, just as a prosecuting attorney in the trial of a criminal case in court should prosecute a case—not to unjustly convict the defendant, but to present the evidence, and all the evidence, to the court, and to see that it is properly laid before the court.

Now, I want to call attention to the principles upon which the investigation was conducted, and not simply the conclusions or the verdict reached by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Many of the members of the present committee signed that report and concurred in it, and presumably they entertained the views therein expressed as to the relevancy of certain great lines of testimony, which necessarily will be involved in any new investigation. The resolution of the Senator from Virginia in its concluding paragraph provides:

> The committee is further and specially instructed to inquire fully into and report upon the alleged "jack-pot" fund in its relation to and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate.

It proposes that that resolution should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and yet the Committee on Privileges and Elections, after careful reflection, has reported its opinion here that such testimony as that has no relevancy or bearing upon the Lorimer case. So we would be, if the resolution introduced by the Senator from Virginia should be adopted, in the position of forcing upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections an inquiry which they have deliberately held and reported to the Senate to be absolutely irrelevant, so far as the case under consideration is concerned. It seems to me that some of the principles enunciated by the committee are quite remarkable, and I read from the report:

> Much of the testimony taken upon the investigation related to the alleged payment of money to members of the General Assembly of Illinois by one Robert E. Wilson. This was denied by Wilson and by others, and after considering all the evidence on that subject, the committee are not prepared to find that the fact is established.

But mark this language:

> But whether the sums of money claimed to have been paid were or were not paid, that fact has no relevancy to the matter which the committee was appointed to investigate.

In other words, if it should be found by the committee that large sums of money were paid to members of the Legislature of Illinois by a man who was admitted to be interested in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER—if the recipient came along, actuated by the invariable impulse of a man charged with a crime, and denied the secret motive of his mind, which no man can read, claiming that he was not actuated and controlled by the payment of that money—the committee records its opinion as a matter of law in this case that, even though all the members of the legislature should be bribed in that way or should have been the recipients of money—that is the necessary inference, of course—that if in its view that testimony was irrelevant, the bribery of every member of the legislature would be irrelevant. They do not base it upon the question of whether or not a sufficient number were bribed to deprive him of a majority, but they say:

> But whether the sums of money claimed to have been paid were or were not paid, that fact has no relevancy to the matter which the committee was appointed to investigate.

I desire to go on record as a member of this body as opposed—not through any personal objection or with any reflection upon the members of the committee—to referring this inquiry to a committee which entertains such views as to the relevancy of the great mass of the evidence in the case; and it is not a question of what conclusions it is going to reach after the evidence is taken, but it amounts to a proposition that they will not consider the evidence because they do not consider it relevant. They go further and say:

> It was therefore no part of the duty of the subcommittee to inquire—

I ventured to say that I thought some parts of this report were remarkable, and I read this from the report in substantiation of that statement:

> It was therefore no part of the duty of the subcommittee to inquire into either the origin of the fund or the purpose for which it was used.

Could the Senate of the United States expect an intelligent finding, which would command the respect of this body and of the country, from a committee which says it is not their duty "to inquire into either the origin of the fund or the purpose for which it was used"? Yet it is proposed here to refer the case again to a committee, a large number of whose members were members of the former committee and entertain those views. I say to do so would not be conducive to giving confidence to the people of this country in the result. It may be invidious to refer to the people of this country, and yet we are all subject to the public opinion of this country. Public opinion is not, as some one has said, the opinion of the average man, but it is the opinion of the great mass of all classes of citizens, operating together through the means of intelligence which we have in this day of enlightenment and education. I say that a report from a committee which has deliberately recorded the views that I have just read as to the scope and nature of this inquiry could not command the respect or confidence of the people. I mean by that statement the respect or confidence of the people in the wisdom and accuracy of their judgment, and not, of course, as to their integrity or their personal motives.

While I am referring to the report of the committee I want to refer also, in substantiation of my statements, to the special report signed by the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who now occupies the chair, who signed the majority report and also filed a separate report, and who is also still a member of the committee. He is entitled to his views, and he is a distinguished and able lawyer, but lawyers differ. We are discussing this question upon a difference of opinion upon legal questions as well as upon questions of fact.

The report of that member of the committee, which I hold in my hand, goes to the extent of saying—and not only goes to the extent, but says it unequivocally in so many words, about which there can be no mistake—that even though a majority of the members of the Legislature of Illinois, every one of them, were bribed to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER, it would not affect the validity of his seat unless it was shown that the bribery was done with his knowledge and consent, or done by himself or by his agent. I dispute that as a proposition which the Senate can afford to adopt. I am not willing to refer this case as a member of this body to a committee a number of whose members apparently entertain such an opinion. I think that it is obnoxious and abhorrent to the system of representative government that a Member of this body and of the investigating committee should record himself as believing, though corruption should be rife, though the legislature should be bribed by parties who were interested in the action of the Member to be elected, even though the entire legislature should be polluted by such corruption, that the Senate should not inquire into it.

I read from the report, to substantiate my statement. It says:

> The Senate may, however, inquire—

Taking the general position, in the first place, apparently that it is a matter largely for the State of Illinois to deal with, and later on in the report, taking that position specifically, that it was better for the State of Illinois to deal with it, and concluding that the State has dealt with it, and consequently that this body ought not to deal with it; in other words, taking the position that the constitutional prerogative of this body to be the judge of the qualifications and election of its own Members should be abdicated and turned over to some jury in the purlieus of Chicago, or to some down-town election district in Chicago, from which one of these guilty legislators was returned to the legislature. That is the position taken by the distinguished member of the committee, because he says:

> The Senate may, however, inquire into the manner of the election of a Member of its body to the extent and for the purpose of ascertaining whether such election was an honest one, representing the will of the members of the legislative body which certifies his election to the Senate, and in doing this we may inquire—> whether the votes cast by members of the legislature were procured by bribery of such members, by the person for whom they voted or by anyone on behalf of such person with the knowledge or consent of such person, and in case we should find that such bribery existed we should find that his election was procured in violation of the law, and the person so selected should not be permitted to hold the office of Senator.

This is what we may inquire into according to him—

In other words, if we should find that these votes were procured by the person for whom they were cast or by some one on his behalf, with his knowledge and consent. According to that language—and I am not technical at all about it, but am giving it a liberal construction, looking at it from every standpoint—even though they were bribed on his behalf, yet unless it could be shown, what in most cases it is absolutely impossible to show, that the bribery was done with the personal knowledge and consent of the beneficiary, the Senate should purge him of the taint of corruption and allow him to take his seat in a body whose business is largely conducted upon the theory, and the theory alone, that every Member is an honest and an honorable man. The senior Senator from Idaho says in his report that—

> The committee granted this request—

That is, the request that the Chicago Tribune should be represented—

> The committee granted this request and a large amount of testimony was introduced, much of which was outside the legitimate scope of the inquiry and some of which consisted of the testimony of members of the legislature establishing the unreliability, and even infamy, of such witnesses.

In other words, after a long inquiry, consuming a number of weeks, the committee came to the conclusion that men who sold their votes in the Legislature of Illinois were infamous and unreliable. Of course, they were infamous and unreliable. The committee seems to have proceeded upon the theory—and I base this upon a careful examination of the report—that everything that these witnesses said was true except their admissions that they had been bribed. The committee takes up the case of the four members of the Legislature of Illinois who had confessed that they were bribed. Ordinarily the confession of a man that he was bribed is entitled to credence. That is in harmony with the theory of evidence because it is a declaration against interest. A declaration of a man that he was not bribed ordinarily would not be entitled to very much weight in court because it is a self-serving declaration, a declaration in his own interest, prompted by the natural laws of human nature; but when a man says that he was bribed, his admission is entitled to credence, even in a court where the strictest rules of the common law prevail, because it is not natural that a man would make a declaration of that kind unless he was impelled to do so by its truth, and probably by the fact that he believed that his crime had been discovered. Yet this committee reverses the philosophy of evidence; it reverses the principles upon which evidence is admitted in the courts throughout the land under the common law. It disbelieves the declaration against interest and believes and bases its finding upon the self-serving declaration—the denials on the part of members of the legislature that they had received bribes.

When I started to read this report and read the manner in which the committee disposed of the first witness, White, I was not much astonished. I thought perhaps some special circumstances applied to White that caused the committee to disregard his admission that he had been bribed and to believe his subsequent denial that he had not been bribed; but when I proceeded to read further in the report and found that one after another of four men made admissions at different times and places that they had accepted bribes, and that in each case the committee found to all intents and purposes that they had not accepted bribes; that their admissions that they had acceped bribes were not credible, but that, on the contrary, in each one of the four cases where these men had come before the public and admitted being bribe takers they had falsely besmirched their own character and the standing of their families. When I read that I must say that I felt almost, so far as this hearing was concerned, as if we had come to the age of miracles again.

Now, the question is before the Senate whether, on the resolution of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections [Mr. DILLINGHAM] or the resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], we shall refer this case to a committee which, whatever new evidence there may be, have already shown their disposition and their determination, I might say—because it is their action—to exclude the testimony of the four men who admitted they were bribed, and lay down the rules of procedure to which I have referred; or whether it shall be referred to a new committee which has not enunciated any such strange principles of evidence, none of whom have ever said that it made no difference how many members of the legislature were bribed unless it could be shown that it was done with the knowledge and consent of the beneficiary, and who, whether or not they have determined upon the final verdict in the case at this time, are yet free to form their opinions upon reason and upon justice as to the mode of procedure and the relevancy of testimony, because I venture to say that none of them have fixed opinions upon those questions.

I venture to say, notwithstanding the assertion that every Member of this body has already formed his opinion, and, consequently, that every one of them is in the same position that the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections are, and that it makes no difference what kind of a committee you have—whether it is the Committee on Privileges and Elections or a select committee—that that is very far from the fact.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not desire to interrupt the Senator just at that point, but I understood him to say that the committee has held and reported that it was of no consequence as to the number of votes which had been bribed, provided the beneficiary had no knowledge of the bribe. Does he understand that to be the committee's report?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Texas misunderstood me. What I said was that one member of the committee, who is still a member of the committee, had filed a separate report, in which he had enunciated that doctrine.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Senator to say that that was the report of the committee. I knew it was not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was a special report by one member of the committee, who also signed the majority report.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not think the Senator could have read the committee's report to that effect.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, I have read the committee's report, and did not so state. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would now ask the Senator from Washington to refer me to the language in which he charges that I took the position that if all the members of the legislature were bribed, unless the candidate knew of it, it would not affect his election.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not state that you used the language "if all of them were bribed." I said that was the necessary inference from what was stated. This is the language, at the bottom of page 16 of the report:

> We may inquire whether the votes cast by members of the legislature were procured by bribery of such members, by the person for whom they voted, or by anyone on behalf of such person with the knowledge or consent of such person.

That is, in stating the limitation of the inquiry; and reading further—

> And in case we should find that such bribery existed we should find that his election was procured in violation of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest that the Senator must have a different copy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have the official copy, Senate Report No. 942, of the Sixty-first Congress, third session.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, in fairness, let us have the language:

> The Senate may, however, inquire into the manner of the election of a Member of its body to the extent and for the purpose of ascertaining whether such election was an honest one, representing the will of the members of the legislative body which certifies his election to the Senate, and in doing this we may inquire whether the votes cast by members of the legislature were procured by bribery of such members by the person for whom they voted, or by anyone on behalf of such person with the knowledge or consent of such person, and in case we should find that such bribery existed we should find that his election was procured in violation of the law, and the person so selected should not be permitted to hold the office of Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a great deal of difference——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Allow me to state——

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to finish.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator himself has read the report. My contention is that if there was bribery, especially if there was wholesale bribery, of members of the legislature by some one who was interested in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, his seat should be vacated, whether it was done by him or with his knowledge and consent or not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was only dealing with the one proposition which I had undertaken to discuss. I was not dealing at that time with the effect that the action of Mr. LORIMER might have or with the question as to how many corrupted votes would unseat him. The Senator selected a part of the consideration of a subject and did not give the whole subject matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think I read the entire paragraph. I am willing for the Senator from Idaho to read it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The paragraph——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Excuse me——

Mr. HEYBURN. I only just wanted to stay the hand at that point. I shall call the attention of the Senate to that report, but I will do it on my own time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was just going to say that I am perfectly willing at this time, or at any other time, that any other part of the report which can be construed as changing in any way the meaning or the effect of what I have read should be called to the attention of the Senate. I have read it all.

Mr. HEYBURN. I took the position that if only one vote was corrupt, and LORIMER was connected with it, it would vitiate his election. I then took the position that if LORIMER was not connected with it, it must be shown that enough votes were corrupted to change the result of the election.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That does not appear in the report.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will appear in my remarks in the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I apprehended that the report was a deliberate one and represented the mature opinion of the Senator. Of course I do not know what actuated the committee in forming its opinions or why apparently throughout the report the testimony in behalf of Mr. LORIMER, of the slightest nature, should have been accepted by the committee as the truth, and testimony to the opposite effect throughout the report should have been reported by the committee as not worthy of credence. What I am referring to the Senator will find in each one of the subdivisions of the report dealing with the four self-confessed bribe takers, and particularly in the summary of the testimony as to each of these four cases contained in the committee's report. At the bottom of page 14, for instance, they say:

> Much of the testimony taken upon the investigation related to the alleged payment of money to members of the General Assembly of Illinois by one Robert E. Wilson.
